There is a region in Mississippi that is occupied almost exclusively by colored people. In the interior of this region the only way to dispense justice has at times been for the negroes themselves to organize a court and try some case of such importance as seemed to demand attention. As for small breaches of the law, such as stealing chickens, watermelons and the like, the individuals dispossessed were expected to attend to the matter themselves.

One day a gentleman from Vicksburg, who was traveling through this region, had occasion to speak with a certain colored man and was told that he was sitting in a woodshed conducting a murder trial. Going to the humble courtroom, the visitor looked in and saw the court in session. Taking a back seat, he observed the proceedings.

Caesar Henderson, black as coal, was on trial for the murder of Tecumseh Bodman, a rival for the affections of Dinah Ochiltree. The rivals had visited Dinah during the evening before the murder and had left together. They were heard quarreling on the road. The next morning Tecumseh was missing. Since he did not turn up for some days Caesar was accused of his murder, and, there being no regular court within many miles, he was tried by his peers in the woodshed. Dinah, the object of contention, was being questioned by the judge, who also acted as counsel for the state and the defense. He was also the twelve jurymen.

"Dinah," he said severely, "wha' fo' yo' hab two lubbers hangin' roun' yo', persuadin' 'em to fight fo' yo'? Don' yo' know dat wo'se'n murder?"

"I couldn't help dey fightin' fo' me," replied Dinah, with a toss of her head.

"Wha' time did dey leab yo' dat night when Caesar killed Tecumseh?"

"I didn't kill Tecumseh," protested Caesar.

"Shet up," cried the judge, glaring at the prisoner from under a pair of heavy gray eyebrows, "or I fine yo' fo' contempt ob cou't."

The question having been repeated, the witness said that she reckoned the two men left her between "'leben o'clock and some time in de mawnin." She reckoned it was near the latter.

"How do yo' know dat?" asked the judge.

"How yo' know Zeb been chicken huntin'?"

"Did yo' see Zeb?"

"I thought yo' said it war mawnin'?"

The witness was excused, and Lem Barker was called to the stand.

"Lem," said the judge, looking at the rafters, "tell de cou't how yo' know Caesar killed Tecumseh."

"Kase I hearn 'em fightin'."

"Which war lickin' de uddes?"

"How I know dat? I couldn' see 'em fightin' in de dark."

Another witness testified that he lived next door to Tecumseh and that the latter had been missing since "de dark ob de moon" and that Tecumseh's dog "was a-whinin' all de time kase he marster didn' come home no mo'." Then Dinah was recalled and testified that the call on her by the rivals was made during "de dark ob de moon." This completed the evidence. The judge called upon the prisoner to stand up and, being obeyed, proceeded to convict and sentence him at the same time. He was to be taken out to "de ole tree wid de low branch convenient fo' hangin' pussons" and hanged by the neck until he was "daid."

"Wha' fo' yo' gwine hang Caesar, judge?" she shouted. "Dah ain't no sense in dat. At de dark ob de moon I hab two lubbers to choose from. One killed de udder, and now yo' gwine to hang de one lef'. Wher do I come in?"

At the statement of this obvious injustice the judge scratched his wool.

"I's might' sorry bout dat, Dinah. But it's too late now. I done sentence de prisoner."

There was a babel of tongues, some insisting that a sentence having been pronounced, there was no going back on it. Others claimed that it was mighty hard on Dinah. The hubbub was quieted by the gentleman observer, who stepped to the front and said:

"Your honor, I am an attorney in Vicksburg, and if you will listen to me I think I can tell you how the prisoner can be legally saved from the gallows."

"We derive our laws from England. An English king, Edward II., issued an edict that when a man was sentenced to be hanged for any crime, if a woman could be found to marry him, he should go free. According to this law, which we have inherited from England, if Dinah will marry Caesar he will escape the gallows."

There was nothing in the learned speech that the darkies understood until the speaker came to the last ten words; then a shout arose, and the pair were forthwith united in marriage.

THE NEW STATE CONSTITUTION—9.

The Problem of Municipal Home-Rule.

For twenty years the cities of the state have been talking about getting municipal home-rule. They have fought individually and independently against petty interference from Albany and the political parties have found it expedient to talk sympathetically about municipal home-rule in their platforms. Recently the cities began to get together effectively for their common defense, and the annual Conference of Mayors has become a most important affair. With the aid of the Municipal Government Association, a state wide orgahization of home-rule advocates, the cities have secured the passage of the so-called Municipal Empowering Law and the Optional City Charter Law. The first law conferred upon the cities a long list of specific powers making it unnecessary for each city to carry a special submeration of powers in its charter and giving to all the cities of the state the same full grant of powers. This removed the necessity for a large number of special bills in the legislature every year. The second bill gave to the second and third class cities their choice of seven skeleton forms of government. It was under the provisions of this bill that the city of Niagara Falls recently secured the interesting Commission-Manager form of Government.

Cities to Make Their Own Charters.

At the Constitutional Convention the Conference of Mayors hope to secure the adoption of a provision that will give to the cities of the state the right to adopt their own charters, the charter when finished to be adopted in each case by local popular vote without reference to the legislature. California, Colorado, Missouri, Ohio, Michigan and many other states give to their cities the right to do this. In fact, home-made city charters are almost as common now in the United States as the kind that are made miles away at the State Capitol and the time will come when all the cities in the nation will have home-made charters. The only opposition to the idea comes from people who do not understand how these things can be worked without interfering with the sovereignty of the state.

In drafting a plan of municipal home-rule for New York State the Municipal Government Association and the Conference of Mayors have chosen to be very conservative and have kept this question of the sovereignty of the state constantly in mind. Accordingly, instead of trying to fence off for the cities a special field of powers within which the state is not to be allowed to interfere, the promoters of home-rule for the cities of New York have provided simply that the cities may do whatever they want to do in regard to their own affairs, provided it is not specifically prohibited by law. Special local legislation of any kind by the legislature is definitely prohibited. The sovereignty of the state is completely protected; the only regulation is that the state must treat all cities alike. If for example the legislature wants to prevent the City of New York from changing the salaries of its policemen, it can do so but only by the expedient of prohibiting all the other cities of the state from changing their policemen's salaries. It is the belief of the mayors that this amendment will give to the cities protection by reason of the fact that any attempt by the legislature to interfere with the government of a city will involve interfering simultaneously with the government of all other cities, thereby bringing down upon the legislature a storm of opposition that will suffice to prevent the passage of an objectionable bill.

At present the cities of the state have no power whatever except such as the legislature chooses to grant to them specifically. After the adoption of this amendment the cities will be presumed to have all the powers of local self government that can be imagined, provided only that the state can withdraw any of those powers by restrictive acts.

Rural Sections Will Be Benefited.

Indirectly the rural sections of the state have a great deal to gain by the home-rule amendment, by reason of the great improvement which it will bring about in the legislature. Today the legislature is in constant discussion over local questions of municipal government. The member from Schenectady, for example, may have a bill amending the Schenectady city charter. To him the passage of that bill is all-important. His people at home rely upon him to get it passed. He is compelled to knuckle down to the party leaders in order to get it through, and thereby is forced to agree to do the bidding of the machine when it comes to voting on other measures. If the Schenectady legislator is obedient and docile, Schenectady will get its amendment. If not, the city will suffer. The interest of the whole state suffers too, and will continue to suffer so long as the influence of local legislation continues to make puppets of the legislators at Albany.

[This is the last of a series of nine articles prepared jointly by the Municipal Government Association, the County Government Association and the New York Short Ballot Organization on questions to come before the Constitutional Convention.]

Washington Mecca for Cranks With Schemes

Every great national issue brings forth a fresh crop of wierd, mysterious individuals, each with a wonderful but woefully impossible scheme for solving the problem. They all flock to Washington and, like the 17-year locust, no one knows whence they come, nor whither they go—the number of them who become Uncle Sam's compulsory guests is small. "Bugs" they are called, and thorns in the side of Washington officialdom they are.

Infinite confidence in the merits of their scheme and a proportionate amount of unconsumed time at their disposal are their greatest assets. To inflict both commodities on public officials is their unanimous and all-consuming aim—the higher the public servant, the better. None is immune.

The European war being an international affair, has brought forth a crop commensurate with its importance. No longer do they restrict their efforts to Government officials, but have widened their field so that it now includes the foreign embassies and legations.

Methods for ending the war are the topics uppermost in their minds now. Some of these schemes are "fearfully and wonderfully evolved."

Jules Verne, that enchanting master of the psuedo-scientific, even in his wildest flights of imagination, had nothing—absolutely nothing at all—on the man who called on Secretary of the Navy Daniels a few days ago. Even Frank Stockton with his negative gravity must "take the count" before this prestidigitator of natural laws.

Armed with a mysterious black satchel and an ominous roll of blue prints securely clutched under his arm, he swooped down upon Secretary Garrison's office.

But before anyone is admitted to that sanctum sanctorum he has to produce a valid excuse to the guardian and economizer of that official's time.

"Ah, yer, Mr. Blankhead," said this custodian wearily, taking the caller's card.

"Blankhead," snapped the other reverely.

"Yes, yes, to be sure," he corrected, "Now if you could give me an idea of the nature of your business with the Secretary," he suggested.

The man's attitude underwent a sudden change. He peered cautiously around and coming closer whispered confidentially: "I have here a device for raising an enormous load many hundreds feet into the air. Now, one wonderful feature of this idea is this: Air itself is used to support the load—a column of air is ejected upward with such force and concentration that it will maintain at the desired height a tremendous weight.

His manner became more confidential. "Now, the practical use to which it could be put is one that Secretary Garrison will see in a moment. Other countries, those at war—have offered fabulous sums for it, but patriotism prompts me to give my own country the fruits of my brains.

"Young man," he demanded, "do you realize the value of this invention? Do you realize what a tremendous advantage a battleship or a fort raised—say several hundred feet—by this column of air would have on an enemy? The mind is paralyzed at the possibilities! Ah, I see you are astounded at it, but believe me, I did not desire to startle you."

"This," he added impressively, "will revolutionize warfare. They all know it, and have had secret agents following me, night and day. "In constructing this device, I was obliged to exhaust calculus of infinite distances, kinotics, aerostatics and aerodynamics. In logarithms I was forced to penetrate so far that there is nothing left in the branches of mathematics for future ages—, it is exhaused, a dead ——"

"What do you want to do," confided the clerk, "I will not bother with seeing Secretary Daniels,—he wouldn't be able to appreciate it—it's too wonderful. The man who handles such matters is in the room three doors up the hall. Explain to him all the mathematics of it fully. He may try to discourage you at first but that's only for effect. Make him listen to all the details."

DROP FULL CREW APPEAL

Republican Senators Determine Upon a Compromise Measure.

Albany, Mar. 25.—The Republican Senators in caucus rejected the Conkling bill repealing the so-called Full Crew law which was enacted during the Sulzer administration and approved by Mr. Sulzer in pursuance of a secret ante-election pledge. After much discussion a sub-committee composed of Senator Elon R. Brown and Senator J. Henry Walters of Syracuse was authorized to draft a compromise measure, which was introduced in the Senate today.

It was learned that the compromise bill will not provide for the repeal of the Full Crew act, but will open the way for railroad companies to make application to the Public Service Commissions for exemption from its provisions, placing the burden of proof in such cases on the railroad companies.

From what went on in the caucus it was evident that the compromise plan was determined upon as am atter of policy to conciliate the labor organizations, which have conducted a vigorous campaign against the proposed repeal.

BASEBALL BILL BLOCKED

Albany, Mar. 25.—An effort to get out of Codes Committee of the Assembly the McElroy bill, providing for Sunday baseball, resulted in a tie vote of six to six. The vote of Assemblyman Grennan of New York against the bill blocked the right of the New York City delegation to carry the fight to the floor of the Assembly. Assemblyman Flamman of Kings was absent and as he is understood to be for the measure, it will probably come out of the committee next week.

Those for the Sunday ball measure were Dewitt of Uulster, Mitchell of New York, Burke of New York, Aranow of New York, Callahan of the Bronx and Bacher of Kings.

Those against: Knight of Wyoming, Bulcher of Onondaga, Brennan of New York, Chase of Columbia, Everett of St. Lawrence and Parker of Niagara.

Woman's World

State Senator Who Says She Is an Ordinary Home Woman.

SENATOR KATHRYN CLARKE.

To an interviewer State Senator Kathryn Clarke of Oregon said: "I was born at Gardnier, Douglas county, Ore. —I usurp a woman's right of not telling the date—but I was the first white child ever baptised in the little town. There being no local minister one was imported for the occasion, so you see I really got a very good start in the right direction. I have lived in Douglas county practically all my life. My home is in Glendale, southern Oregon.

"From the position I now occupy one would think me a politician. Such is not the case. I am just an ordinary home woman, and when one quiet Sunday afternoon I was called to the phone and received the news that Governor West had seen fit to appoint me to fill the vacancy in the state senate no one could have been more surprised than I. When asked if I would accept I most emphatically said 'No,' but after consulting some friends and thinking it over could find no good reason why I shouldn't take this opportunity and break the ice for women to enter the senate even though I would perhaps not be able to do more than this. After accepting the appointment the senators, having the privilege of electing me or otherwise, chose otherwise, so it was necessary to hold a special election, and with three candidates in the field I was elected by a good majority. As this election took place on Jan. 20 and the legislature convened Jan. 11 I came into the august body just two weeks late. This fact made it rather difficult, as I had never even visited the legislature and knew absolutely nothing of the details or workings of the body in any respect, but after a busy few days I began to see the light, and after four weeks am free to say there is nothing in lawmaking that any woman of ordinary intellect cannot easily comprehend and be able to vote intelligently upon; also that women are not the only talkers, and if the women as legislators talk more than our Oregon senators have at this session the future generation may not expect much lawmaking in our future legislatures."

A perfect baby boy and a perfect baby girl have been dedicated to each other by their mothers in the hope that in the coming years love, guided by maternal hands, may lead to a eugenic marriage. The 100 point children who are unconsciously facing a made to order romance are William Charles Flynn, thirty-seven months old, and Alene Calvert Houch, seventeen months old, of Los Angeles, Cal.

After the babies emerged from a baby congress, each with a "perfection tag," their mothers held a conference. Three times before the children have won first prizes in the same baby show. The boy is the winner of fourteen first prizes and the girl of six.

The mothers are convinced that fate has thrown their children together for some great purpose, but they have agreed that they will not resort to any form of coercion in shaping the future of their children.

Following are the essential facts of interest in connection with the 100 point perfect boy baby and the 100 point perfect girl baby. The scores were announced only after a most rigid examination by several scientists, surgeons and eugenic enthusiasts.

Comfort For the Tourist.

For the tourist planning to go to the California exposition a very suitable parting gift is a utility case. These come in all sorts of practical designs. One of the most unusual is of Roman stripe ribbon outside. It folds over in half to be carried by a leather handle, so that it closely resembles a hand bag, as the silk is also bound around the edge with leather. Inside the case is lined and fitted with thin black rubber and contains pockets for every conceivable toilet utensil.

Of course shapes and covers vary with the price, but all are attractive. One case folds up quite small and contains only two pockets, one for a face cloth, the other for comb and toothbrush.

The Incendiary

By EVERETT P. CLARKE

I was in a criminal courtroom one day among the spectators when I saw a man sentenced for incendiarism for five years. His wife was in court, and the scene between them after the sentence had been passed was heartrending. I saw the man's face but a few moments, and it was distorted by agony, but it was impressed upon my mind.

The crime had been committed in the town of Hilton, which was the county seat. I lived in Hilton, but had no acquaintance with the convict. Several fires had occurred at short intervals. One night a citizen saw a man setting fire to the building. By the light of the newly kindled flame the citizen got a glimpse of the incendiary's face, but before he could reach him he had disappeared in the darkness. A few days later he met the man Mansfield I had seen sentenced in the street and recognized him for the firebug. The result was conviction.

Within a few months after Mansfield had been taken to the penitentiary a series of fires occurred in Allanville, some twenty miles from Hilton. I had meanwhile removed to Allanville and was interested in these fires, naturally connecting them with those that had occurred in Hilton. Had I not seen the perpetrator of the incendiarism in Hilton sent to prison for five years I would have connected him with the fires in Allanville. Indeed, I made inquiries as to where Mansfield was and was told that he was serving out his time.

A number of citizens of Allanville volunteered to watch at night, and I was one of them. There were twelve of us, and we divided our number into three watches of four each. One night or, rather, morning, for it was 2 o'clock, I saw a man walking some distance ahead of me. I followed him, but before I caught up with him I met one of the watchers. On asking him about the party ahead of me, whom he must have passed, he said that he knew him well. His name was Simpson. He was troubled with insomnia, and, not being able to sleep, he would go out and walk the streets.

I was perfectly satisfied with this explanation and went back to my beat. Notwithstanding our vigilance the fires continued, and we failed to be on the ground when they were lighted. They were not very frequent, and some of the watchers began to think that occurring as they did was merely a coincidence. One after another gave up watching till there were but half a dozen of us left.

I met Simpson on several occasions, but never in sufficient light to see his face. One night when walking with a fellow watcher Simpson passed us. My companion bade him good evening, spoke a few words to him, and we passed on. We were near a street lamp when we met him, and I got a glimpse of his partially lighted face.

Something within me, some psychological working, seemed to connect Simpson with the fires. I said nothing to my companion of my feeling, but resolved that I would devote my future watchings to Mr. Simpson. But I asked questions as to who and what he was and was told that he was a good citizen and the father of a highly respected family.

Acting on an impression for which I could not account, I spent several of my periods of watching near Mr. Simpson's house. On the third night I saw him go out and shadowed him. He walked about aimlessly for awhile, then returned to his home. I was so far satisfied that he was what he was considered to be that I gave up my purpose of shadowing him. But I could not get rid of the impression I had received.

One morning about dawn when I was about to go home from my watch I saw one of our party coming with a policeman who had a man by the arm. I waited till they came up, and, behold, the prisoner was Simpson! I was told that he had been caught setting fire to a building.

The town of Allanville was greatly shocked to learn that its respected fellow citizen was a firebug. He was tried for his crime and adjudged insane on the testimony of alienists, who considered his insomnia the cause of his insanity. He was acquitted on the promise of his family to send him to a private sanitarium.

When I first saw Simpson in the light I recognized—or thought I recognized—Mansfield, who had been convicted of the same crime at Hilton. Then I began to suspect that Simpson was a different person and was the real criminal in both cases. I asked if he had ever lived at Hilton and was told that he had been staying there temporarily at the time the fires had occurred there. This settled the matter in my mind.

I went at once to Hilton, called on Mrs. Mansfield and told her that I thought I had proof of her husband's innocence. The happiest moment of my life was when, on telling her my story, I saw her face light up with a mingled relief and joy.

Mansfield, on his innocence being established, was pardoned by the governor of the state, which was a quicker way to set him free than a new trial.

If the scene of Mansfield being torn from his family was heartrending, my happiness at having vindicated him and restored his family was ecstatic. We are all now living [illegible]

PUNISHED FOR WIVES.

A habit developed by French wives of visiting their soldier husbands at the front, according to the Frankfurter Zeitung, has led General Joffre to prohibit such visits and warn the husbands of punishment for their wives' disregard of this order. In publishing the text of the order the Frankfurter Zeitung says that the perseverance of the wives in eluding the military guards is remarkable in that it is very difficult for any noncombatant to get to the French lines, even the official war correspondents being allowed to go there only for very brief periods. The paper cites the following order, published in the Temps, as issued by the commander of one infantry regiment:

"Every married man has the duty, as required by civil law, to strive for the obedience of his wife. Therefore every married soldier must be in a position to prevent his wife from visiting him. The worse for the married men if they have not sufficient authority over their wives to enforce the obedience demanded by the civil law. Therefore they are to be made responsible for the obedience of their wives. If in former times a married woman succeeded in getting into the army, inasmuch as it was not possible to throw her into prison, her husband was imprisoned instead, since he was made responsible for the poor military training of his wife. That method was not so foolish as it appears to be at first glance, and it will be applied again in such cases as occur."

WAR BABE FOR ADOPTION.

German Mother Unable to Get Word of Her Soldier Husband.

Mrs. Carl Muller of Yaphank has inserted an advertisement in several Long Island papers offering for adoption a newborn war babe, whose mother, a German woman, is stopping at Mrs. Muller's home.

"The baby's mother, who doesn't want her name known save to the couple who, she hopes, will adopt her little daughter, does not know whether she is a widow or not," said Mrs. Muller to a reporter. "The mother is a friend of mine who came to the United States after her husband had been forced to fight for Germany. She has tried repeatedly to obtain word from or of her husband without result, and she has no knowledge whether he has been killed or is still fighting. She feels that she cannot care for her daughter, who was born on Feb. 27, and is a little dear, and she is willing to give full surrender to a couple who can convince her that the baby will have a good home and kind treatment."

REGULATE YOUR HEIGHT.

Harvard Professor's Discovery May Control Growth.

A series of experiments with the so called ductless glands of the human body, which, if successful, may make it possible for the man of science to control the physical stature of the human being, is now being conducted at the Harvard Medical school.

Hundred of cases treated at the hospitals connected with the medical school serve to bear out Professor Cannon's conclusions. Strange changes in the human structure and mind development have already been noted and tabulated as the result of different surgical and medical treatments of gland diseases. By the giving or withholding of gland drugs the weight of patients has been increased or diminished at will.

Professor Cannon states that future discoveries in this field may prove fully as amazing and beneficial as those that followed the study of bacteria.

TOWN PLANNING PRINCIPLES

BY THOMAS ADAMS

should include details of the buildings already erected, the distribution of population, and of traffic conditions. In San Francisco it is estimated that $26,000,000 was the cost of improvements which might have been avoided if the city planning had been adjusted to the topography. There is need for more investigation of existing conditions in regard to traffic distribution, factory and residential location, layout of railway stations and harbor fronts and the interrelation of these. Town planning for the future is cheaper than replanning areas which have already been developed, and has not the same injurious result on property.

It has been proved that with healthy conditions the mortality in the city need not be higher than that in the country. There is a great cry of taking people back to the land. So far as that is practicable, it is desirable to encourage it, but it is well known that in every civilized country cities are growing, and there are few who will venture the opinion that they are likely to cease to grow in the future. We have to try to bring more land to the people as well as to take the people to the land.

Is Town Planning a Fad?

There are men who think interference with what they call natural growth and any kind of originality is a sin. To them town planning, and even projects for improvement of housing conditions, are visionary; they look to individual regeneration for all measures of reform. These men are unsound in their judgment because they fail to appreciate the fact that the city and homes that constitute part of the city are artificial creations, and that in all things artificial we have to improve as we progress and regulate as we grow.

There are others who think that all things fanciful and picturesque are fads, therefore town planning is a fad. That is because they may have failed to inquire what town planning is or have been misled as to its meaning.

The frequent assumption that town planning relates only to the esthetic side of city life and does not enter directly into its business, its ethical and its public health conditions, is responsible for this error. It is desirable that citizens should aim at making their city beautiful, that they should endeavor to give expression in fine buildings and streets to their civic ideals, but these things, after all, are only the coping stones of the city structure, of which the foundation is the efficient workshop and the healthy home.

Town Planning and Growth

We see, then, how broad-based town planning is. We see also that the improvement of housing and sanitary conditions is not detached from town planning, but is an essential part of it.

The proper time to plan existing cities as a whole has passed, but we can plan the portion that is likely to be built upon in the next forty or fifty years. Up to the present most cities have been developed anyhow. When Dr. Brown asked the little girl "Who made you?" she said, "God made me so far," indicating her baby stature, "and I grew the rest myself." The same may be said of many of our American cities. They have been endowed by Providence with beautiful sites and might be said to have grown the rest themselves. But the analogy is imperfect, for the child, like all natural things, but unlike the city, was the conscious design of its Maker, fashioned so as to grow up in symmetry and to develop along certain decreed lines. Some folks say that a city must be allowed to grow and you cannot control its growth; but cities are not really growths at all, for proper growth follows the lines of some plan; witness the tree or the child in nature. What our cities really do is to expand or bulge out by accretion.

Town Planning and Housing

In Britain we have found from long experience that it is futile to destroy slums unless you find some means to rehouse those who now live in them. In both Britain and American the evil has become too deeply rooted to be remedied by mere regulation.

It may be claimed thot those who live in slums do not want better conditions, but in practice it is found that improved environment converts the men and women of the slum into decent and responsible citizens.

When we allow a slum race to be created in our midst, we cannot expect to reform them suddenly merely by altering their conditions. Nature demands compensation for any lack of foresight and indifference in the past; and when once people become habituated to slums, we have to allow time for them to improve. The state must take a share of the responsibility during the period of transition. Socialism or not, it is the duty of the state to help to heal the sores it has allowed to be made in the body politic; national money, advice and supervision are essential. It is true that in sanitary matters muc his due to individual irresponsibility and ignorance. A Scotch minister once asked his man John if it would not be better for him to give up drinking liquor. "Do you nicht take a drappie yourself, minister?" asks John. "Yes, but circumstances differ." "Very true, sir," says John, "but can you tell me how the streets of Jerusalem were kept so clean?" "No, John." "Well, sir, it was just because everyone kept his own door clean."

No doubt much of the trouble of street and backyard cleaning could be improved by individual care, and more regulation is needed in these respects. But apart from sanitary matters the individual has little power and no responsibility. We must accept the fact that the responsibility for planning our cities, for improving housing conditions and removing the slums rests with the governing authorities and the business men of our cities. We have to pay for past neglect even if in doing so we have to sacrifice some of our theories regarding individual liberty and what we call the functions of government.—The American City.

SACRED MUSIC WITH QUIRK'S SACRED PICTURES

The production comprises nine thousand feet of gorgeously colored film actually made in the Holy Land. Bible students and Scriptural authorities, both in Europe and America, the unanimous in acclaiming this marvelous creation and glorious realization of a great and noble purpose. It is an indisputable fact that the advent of Christ changed the whole course of the world's history and for that reason this timely exposition, in animated photography, is indeed a welcome acquisition to the world of art and literature as well as to Christianity.

In addition to the pictorial visualization a splendid sacred music program is rendered, which of itself is assurance that the atmosphere everywhere will be in keeping with the dignity of the subject. Balcony, 5c; Main Floor, 10c.

ALREADY SECOND STREET LOOKS BRIGHTER

The work of carpenters and painters upon the O. & W. railway station at 2d and Cayuga streets, progresses. The entire neighborhood reflects as a consequence the brightening influence of a coat of lighter colored paint than has in past years adorned the old building. Improvements in the neighborhood are not to stop on the station, as they will be extended as well to the building adjoining the station wherein are housed the baggage department and Adams Express Co.'s office.

BRAKEMAN CALKINS INJURED IN OSWEGO

Oswego, March 26.—Charles E. Calkins, a brakeman on N. Y. C. train 61, was badly injured at noon yesterday. While standing on the rear platform of his train, which had left the shops bound for Richland, he lost his balance in rounding the curve east of the shops, fell from the platform and rolled down a steep embankment, a distance of about thirty feet. Calkins is about forty years old and has been with the railroad company for many years. He was shaken up and bruised severely it was said at the hospital.

HARRY WICKS' PARTY

Harry Wicks had, recently, a birthday. In that he is no different than other boys of the same age, but it is not every boy who is given the same amount of enjoyment as came to Harry. His young friends assisted him in passing one of his early milestones, and after playing games and eating with many exclamations of yum-yums, the dainty luncheon provided by Harry's mother, the young guests returned to their homes.

TROUT SEASON WILL OPEN NEXT SATURDAY

The trout season opens on Saturday, April 3d, providing the Legislature now in session does not pass an amendment to the conservation laws, changing the date of opening. Several amendments are being considered, but whether the opening date of the trout season is one of them is not positively known. The season used to open on April 15th, but the laws of 1914 changed that date to April 3d.

The majority of the fishermen in this section believe that April 3d is much too early to open the season. At that time the streams are usually full of ice and snow water and the trout are still in a torpid winter state. April 15th, according to many fishermen is the earliest that the season should open in this section, and some hold that May 1st is a better opening date. The season closes on August 31st.

The season for lake trout opens on April 1st and closes September 30th. Green, spring and bull frogs may be taken between June 1st and March 31st. The black bass season opens June 16th and closes November 30th.

CZAR'S TROOPS TURN AUSTRIANS' RIGHT WING

Petrograd, March 26.—The capture of Permsyl apparently has filled the entire Russian army with renewed confidence and sent it on a general offensive with the spirit of conquerors. From the Bukowina to Poland the dispatches last night from Petrograd told of Russian advances or fresh activity by the Tsars' troops.

Little has been heard recently of the fighting in Bukowina, but there has been a continual ding-dong engagement in which first the Austrians, then the Russians would have the advantage. Private advices now indicate the Austrian right has met a severe defeat in the region of Czernowitz. The Russians, it seems, after a steady drive to the east, beat around the extreme Austrian right wing, reached the River Sereth and got to the rear of the entire Austrian army in that district.

A pronounced success along the Sereth would reopen to the Russians the way into Transyslvania and again bring Roumania and the probability of that country entering the war prominently to the fore. On ce before the Muscovite troops were at the gateway of Transylvania—in fact, it is believed here the advanced detachments had penetrated the territory. Their presence there brought about the crisis in the Austrian Cabinet which resulted in the resignation of Count Berchtold as Premier, changed the whole complexion of the Servian campaign and sent great German forces into Hungary to aid the Austro-Hungarians in defending their soil. The arrival of the Germans turned the scale and after a series of hard fought battles the Russians fell back until they were reported all beyond the Bukowina boundaries. The recovery of a large part of the lost ground, military observers here believe, shows that Grand Duke Nicholas has been able to despatch heavy reinforcements to his extreme left.

Furious fighting continues at Uzak Pass and big events are expected here within a few days. Both Vienna and Petrograd official statements mention the combat at this point as severe and as still continuing. Since the pass is little more than a normal two days' march from Permsyl, it is the conviction here that at least a part of the besieging army released by the fall of the fortress, will be sent to turn the scale of battle to favor the Russians.

3000 FOREIGNERS LEAVE ITALY FOR HOME

London, March 26.—A Rome dispatch dated March 24 says:—

"Everthing is in readiness for a general mobilization of the Italian army. Seven complete classes are already under the colors.

"The moving away of Austrian and German families is reported from all parts of Italy. It is estimated that about 3000 persons of these nationalties have left Rome. Trains from Milan and Venice to the frontier are filled with Germans and Austrians, and large numbers of Hungarians have left Venice by steamboat for Trieste."

"The Austrians made several furious counter attacks in close rank formation, but were dispersed and party annihilated by our fire and bayonet charges.

"Toward morning of the 24th the enemy began a retreat on certain positions. During the day we took as prisoners about 100 officers and 5600 men, and, besides, captured several dozens of machine guns."

AUSTRIAN

Vienna, via London.—The following official statement was issued today by the Austrian War Office:

"Our troops in the Carpathians on the front west of Uzok Pass have repulsed heavy Russian attacks and the fighting continues. Recently we captured 1500 of the enemy. Near Wyszkow the enemy's attack on the positions we captured on Monday has failed.

"On the remainder of this front nothing of importance has occurred.

"In the southern theatre of the war there have been only isolated artillery duels on the Danube and the Save in the last few days. The general situation remains unchanged."

AUSTRIANS LEAVE LUPKOW; SIR JOHN NEEDS MUNITIONS

London, March 27.—Frederick Rennet, the Daily News' correspondent, tleegraphs from Petrograd:—

"Air reconnaissance have established that the Austrians have withdrawn altogether from Lupkow Pass, in the Carpathians. The Russians are now in unopposed occupation there. There are signs also that the Austro-German armies are availing themselves of the drenched mountain roads to draw back into Hungary.

"Their strongest column, containing the main German force, is now slowing changing its position south of Beskids and Koziomoga. It is expected, in accordance with the Budapest-Berlin compact, that the Magyars and Germans now will prepare a stubborn defensive campaign for the palins of Hungary.

"Large calibre guns have been brought to the Austro-German positions at Yetz, where the cannonade is becoming more intence, with occasional fierce infantry fighting.

"The Myshinetz region, in Northern Poland, nod presents the appearance of a lake whose borders are steadily widening. The strong Russian threat inside the border of East Prussia in the direction of Tilsit had the desired effect of hastening General von Eichhorn's retreat from Suwalki.

"The shooting of the new German infantry is utterly inadequate. Young prisoners admit that they had no musketry training until they entered their first battle."

The Daily News' correspondent at Copenhagen telegraphs:—

"Private Swedish messages announce renewed German activity in the Baltic. Strong German squadrons were observed yesterday both south of the Island of Oeland and north of Gothland, steering northward.

"This explains the recently reported Zeppelin cruises over the Baltic and the Gulf of Bothnia. No doubt the Germans intend at the first opportunity to attack the fortified Russian naval yard at the Aaland Islands. On account of this new German naval activity all ships loaded in Finnish harbors are being held back."

The Daily Telegraph's Petrograd correspondent telegraphs:—

"A correspondent of the Vetchernya Vremya, who arrived at the outskirts of Permysl the day after the surrender, learned that in the final sortie the Austrians lost 8,000 killed alone, while the number of Russian dead was only twenty. Though the Austrians blew up the cupolas of the forts, some of the big guns remained undamaged. A few were actually found with charges in them. Much of the artillery was of anitquated type.

"A quantity of ammunition was obtained, but the Austrians had time to sink a good deal in the bogs which formed part of the defences of the fortress. There were millions of cartridges among the spoils.

"Dead horses lay about in all directions. Many of them bore signs of having had their joints cut off to appease the pangs of the hungry besieged.

"Special preparations are being made on the Galician roads for the transport of the 100,000 prisoners, who apparently are to move into the interior of Russia on foot."

Field Marshal Sir John French has replied to the request of the London Times for an interpretation of the phrase, "a protracted war," which he used in a recent interview.

"The protraction of the war," he says, "depends entirely upon the supply of men and munitions. Should these be unsatisfactory the war will be accordingly prolonged. I dwelt emphatically on the need for munitions."

HEYDECKER TELLS CHAMBER TO SUGGEST

Promises the Best That Is in Him to Reach the Goal Desired by People of Fulton

Last night's meeting of the new Chamber of Commerce indicated at least one essential point—that there is to be no long drawn out sessions. From start to finish there was a snap and go that reeled off the business before the memebership in a trifle more than one hour.

L. W. Emerick presided and Wayne E. Heydecker, secretary, responded to a call for remarks. Mr. Heydecker said that words are not wanted. He assumed that the people of this city prefer to see actions, and that the only way action of the right sort may be obtained is by co-operation and suggestion. Further than this, Mr. Heydecker informed the Chamber htat he is here not to tell the people of this city what they should do to accomplish the looked-for results, but to act entirely upon the demands made upon his time and energy. He promised the men that they will have from him a sincerity of purpose that will in the end bring about the good things desired by those persons who would have Fulton placed in the front rank of progressive towns. He emphasized also the necessity of sending to his office the blanks provided for obtaining opinions regarding the things most needed in the city, and Chairman Emerick as well laid stress upon such action.

J. A. Morrill, 171; N. L. Whitaker, 136; W. P. Morin, 126; J. R. Sullivan, 111; L. W. Emerick, 105; I. Achilli, 102; D. Lipsky, 89; J. C. O'Brien, 89; H. L. Paddock, 79; W. A. Butts, 84; E. J. Penfield, 76; J. J. Jordan, 72; J. H. Conners, 71; A. W. Wiltsie, 54; F. G. Spencer, 37; L. G. Adams, 34; J. W. Stevenson, 30; G. B. Palmer, 28; T. H. Marvin, 21; A. Z. Wolover, 19; E. J. Schem, 18; M. G. Buck, 18; Orin Bogardus, 15; L. C. Foster, 14; V. C. Lewis, 13; W. C. Morgan, 13; A. I. Morton, 13; C. W. Streeter, 13; A. Bristol, 12; H. H. Bristol, 12; G. S. Piper, 12; E. Quirk, 12; M. A. Stranahan, 12; G. E. True, 11.

The names of the first nine men will be placed before the Chamber March 31, when the first election under the new by-laws will be held.

CHAMEBER OF COMMERCE

FULTON, N. Y.

TO THE CITIZENS OF FULTON:

The reorganized Chamber of Commerce has one big idea—To Be of service to Fulton. To translate that idea into action requires:

1. A statement of Fulton's needs by all its citizens, whether members of the Chamber of Commerce or not.
2. Organized co-operation to secure those needs and make them realities.

The Chamber of Commerce is ready to supply, the co-operation and the energy if the citizens come forward with the suggestions. Neither one can succeed alone. Every person in Fulton must have said at some time "This or that thing, should be changed," or "We should have such a thing here." NOW is the time to send those suggestions to the Chamber of Commerce and to help your neighbors and your city to make those dreams come true. Events happen only as some force makes them happen. The citizens of Fulton working in harmony toward common ends represent a great force, the influence of which cannot be over estimated. Those who have been thinking of Fulton and for Fulton really owe it to Fulton to make those thoughts known.

Every suggestion will be carefully considered. None will be discarded. Those that do not seem available for immediate use will be filed for use at a later date.

Send your suggestions in today.

Yours for a bigger, better, busier Fulton,

WAYNE D. HEYDECKER,
Secretary.

STRIKERS DEFY KITCHENER; DELAY WAR SUPPLIES

London, March 27.—Ten thousand Mersey dockers defied Lord Kitchener last night and exhibited a callous disregard for their fellow countrymen on the fighting line by resuming their strike. Their whole complaint is that for work wone on Friday and Saturday they are not paid until the following Saturday. While this continues they declare they will not work during the last of the week, no matter what the consequences to the country may be.

Three steamships were being loaded last evening when work in them was suspended. Several vessels which should leave today will be delayed.

A fresh effort will be made this morning to end the trouble, but the outlook is regarded as serious. It is expected that unless an immediate settlement is reached the measurs forecast by Lord Kitchener will be enforced.

GERMANS LOSE IN ATTACKS ON YSER

On the Belgian Frontier, March 27.—German troops on the Yser front give further indications of the fact that the "wearing away" policy of the Belgians is having a marked effect. The Germans have made a number of half-hearted attacks during several nights this week in the region of the dunes in the belief that their bombardment of the Allies' positions near Lombartzyde had weakened that defensive, but the only result has been further heavy losses, which again have filled Ostend and Bruges with wounded.

There have, in fact, been so many casualties that the authorities have been unable to adhere to the usual policy of moving hospital trains at night time only, and they have been forced to send them eastward by day, in full view of civilians along the line, who keenly realize the significance of this traffic.

VON BUELOW'S EEFORTS ARE SURE TO FAIL

London, March 27.—The Daily News correspondent at Rome telegraphs:

"It is significant that the effects of the neutralists even in the Senate are doomed to failure nowadays, since the appointment of Signor Albertini, editor of the Milan Corriere della Sera and a partisan of intervention, has been ratified by 118 votes against only 30.

"The press here declares that Prince von Buelow's relatives and friends are impotent to aid his neutrality mission, which is doomed to failure, and is denouncing pro-German interference in Italy's internal affairs."

The Italian Consul, says the Times Buenos Ayres correspondent, called a meeting of the agents of the Italian steamship lines and warned the agents to be in readiness for the possible transportation of 60,000 Italian reservists.

Holland Indignant Over Sinking of Steamship Medea

Dutch Newspaper Says Uneasiness and Bitterness Follow Loss of Vessel

Amsterdam, March 27.—A growing wave of indignation is spreading throughout Holland over the sinking by the German submarine U-28 of the Dutch steamship Medea in the English Channel. Coming after a series of other outrages, it has roused Dutch opinion to fever heat. The Dutch newspapers without exception condemn German's attitude toward helpless and innocent shipping and ask for immediate redress.

Though the situation is serious, the Dutch government is keeping its head and will protest to Berlin with stern determination.

The Handelsblad, of Amsterdam, in an article on the sinking of the Dutch steamship Medea by a German submarine, off Beachy Head, on Thursday, says the Medea's orange cargo could not even have been considered conditional contraband and adds:

"The sinking of the Medea is an act of arbitrary violence which cannot be considered a lamentable error. This action, as well as attaacks on Dutch ships from the air, can only be explained on the assumption that Germany feels certain that so long as no foreign troops or warships attacks our country every act of arbitrary violence against Dutch subjects or property is permissible.

A dispatch from The Hague says members of the Netherlands government are refraining from any comment on the subject of interference with and destruction of Dutch shipping by German submarines beyond saying that requests for explanations have been sent to Germany with a view to an eventual protest after Berlin's reply has been received.

The Ministry held an extraordinary council this afternoon, following conferences between the Foerign and Marine Ministers and between the Marine Ministr and the Chief of the Naval Staff. The subjects under discussions were not made public.

The newspapers are taking a serious view of the situation owing, as they put it, to the repeated "unpleasant incidents." They refer to the present sea warfare as "competition in illegality."

Opinions

Widowed Mothers' Pensions

In passing the widowed mothers' pension bill the Legislature has done a thing distinctly to its credit. This is not only a splendid humanitarian measure—a proposal for "the conservation of children," as its legislative advocates termed it— but it is also a money saver. If the experience of other states may be taken as a guide for this one, it will be found cheaper to maintain children under their mothers' care in the homes than in public institutions or by "farming them out" at public expense.

Of the advantages of the home care and home training where the mother is a proper person, mentally and physically, to undertake this task there can be no question. Some time in the dim distant future there may be evolved the ideal institution for children which some intellectuals now dream of to relieve the mothers of a community of the care of their offspring by transferring it to child specialists. That is a long way from the present institutions to which children must be sent when they may not remain with their mothers because of poverty and distress and the stern necessity fora widow's being unincumbered in her efforts to wrest a living from the world.

Home with a mother's care and a mother's love is far better for the child than The Home,however well the institution under existing conditions be run. Governor Whitman should sign this measure, for it will contribute to the betterment of a grievous social condition and mean happiness in many a heart.—The Press.

A Dilemma

It is the greatest pity in the world that when the defenders of the home meet together to oppose the heresy of woman suffrage theg so seldom contrive to come beforehand to an agreement upon a common ground of opposition. On such occasions the very variety of their objections is apt to prove embarrassing for the reason that so many of them are in their nature contradictory, a circumstance not without manifest advantages as long as they are engaged in their favorite occupation of retiring from positions no longer tenable, but inconvenient when their avowed purpose is to demonstrate the unamimity of right thinking people.

At the meeting lately presided over by the indefatigable Miss Chittenden this weakness was abuñdantly apparent in the conflicting opinions set forth by the principal speakers, Mr. Wickersham and Mr. Hayden. Mr. Wickersham talked prettily about chivalry and the sacred, beautiful and noble business of raising children, with the usual vague intimation that as votes are incompatible with children so chivalry is somehow impossible among equals, being a tribute due only to political inferiors."Gradually all that was chivalrous in men must," he said, "be dropped in the scramble for equality." Mr. Hayden, on the other side, made light of chivalry by repeating a sprightly retort he made to a woman who asked him whether he was not for the enfranchisement of her sex. "Yes," he answered smartly,"for when nursemaids, laundresses, housemaids and cooks have the vote it will add a wonderful measure of intelligence to the guidance of affairs."

Mr. Hayden, in short, made it clear that to his thinking woman's proper sphere was too limited to admit of a reasonable share of intelligence, while Mr. Wickersham was persuaded that the vote would oblige women to lower themselves, and he talked fearfully of "feminism, with its hideous propaganda, socialism and Mormonism." But whereas Mr. Hayden was all for saving the state from these evils by keeping the women in their place, Mr. Wickersham insisted that they had their say already, for as "every woman has the ear of at least one man," so, "as a general thing," he argued, "men will do what women ask them to do. He used this observation as an argument to show that women can easily defeat the efforts of the suffragists if they will; if his observation is correct, however, there is no reason why they should wish to do so, since their evil influence is in any event inevitable.—New York Tribune.

TO ADVERTISE

Wide-awake advertising men of Texas are urging the appointment of a board with authority and money to properly advertise the "Lone Star State" and attract settlers and business there. They point out that Minnesota and many other states have done effective work along this line and have added to their greatness and their population by employing the art of the advertising man to display their real advantages for investors and citizens.

Texas advertising men believe that the plain truth about Texas is attractive enough to bring helpful and upbuilding men to live and work within the broad expanse of the state. The ad men believe that good copy in the "right mediums," which are the newspapers, will bring in the men and their families with their capital and their influence to make a greater Texas.

While the details have not been worked out, it is probable that a state board of advertising may be appointed if the matter is acted upon favorably. This board would appropriate the advertising fund and superintend the preparation of copy.

Scientific advertising in newspapers would not only set forth the true advantages of any state, but would go far to correct false and misleading ideas. The ideas and aspirations, the business and financial outlook and future in a state or community, could be presented through the best medium where men of influence would see a place or state as it is.

AT ARM'S LENGTH

The ability to detach oneself and stand far enough outside a situation wherein one is concerned to get the true perspective is a difficult and a somewhat rare accomplishment. We all walk about on earth with our heads at nearly the same level, and no man unaided has been able to jump seven feet above the sod. Therefore it is no small gymnastic feat to transfer oneself, as it were, outside the circle of one's closest personal concern and hold one's entity up before one's own analytic and ruthless scrutiny even as one might hold a kitten or a puppy that cringes and fears punishment.

The readiness to laugh at oneself is one of the most valuable and useful manifestations of a sense of humor. Unutterably wearisome are those people who cannot take light raillery without bridling, who cannot "see a joke" pointed at their self-complacency. They must at all cost preserve their dignity. They are sacrosanct, whatever other targets there are. They stand as frigid perpendicularities in white marble upon pedestals, whom a breath besmirches and a touch profanes. They cannot abate their pose and step down, for it might destroy the illusion, and the crowd might discover they were of the same common clay as that whereof the rest of the race is manufactured.

It is useful for us who are not so great as to be exonerated from natural failings to hold private sessions, now and then with our own souls and discover (without morbid, turbid introspection) what is the matter with us and take steps from vision toward revision. Unfortunate is the case of the man who never throws away old things, old views, out-worn prejudices, threadbare fallacies and superstitions, to provide himself with a brand-new outfit of mental haberdashery.

He who wears immature ideas dresses his mind as ridiculously as a man who wears a boy's clothes arrays his body. We were meant to grow up; we must comply with our destiny; if we are to be world-citizens, we must put away childish things and put on the man, or deny our birthright and betray our cause.

It is generally a disconcerting thing to go to a tailor's and look in his circummuring mirrors get the unflattering pictures of new phases of our ungainly, shabby outer selves. We are conscious that our thoughts are better than we appear. We wish our personalities could be on the outside, for we might then win the world's favorable opinion. Very few are as attractive superficially as they believe their natures entitle them to be considered. There is the old saying about a singed cat being better than it looks; the tramp complains that he is judged by his garment, not his heart, Why should not both be right?

Even so, when we stand to have the measure of our spirits taken by our own footrules, to find whether we have shrunk or added cubits to our stature, we find so much to disgust and dishearten that we wonder if it is worth while to try to repair the sorry outfit. Yet that is part of the day's work, as much as the practice of a trade that one is paid for. Chatterton's hero, Sir Charles Bawdin, "summed up the actions of each day each night before he slept"; and even though Sir Charles may have been some such happy warrior as Chaucer gave us in his immortal portrait of the "very perfect gentle knight," no doubt he often sickened of the apparition he beheld when he held the mirror up to his own nature. But such displeasure—only known to folk with a conscience—is not discreditable if it leads away from mere self-reviling to an appreciable change.—Public Ledger.

War-Made Democracy

James Slim, a Jamaica negro, who had served in the French Foreign Legion, has become a private in the Coldstream Guards and is training with the reserve battalion at Windsor, according to dispatches from London. In France that would not mean much, for the color line hardly exists there, as Americans understand it. England, much more liberal on questions of race and color than this nation, has not hitherto accepted blacks in a white regiment. For a negro now to be permitted to enter not only a white regiment but one with the position and prestige of the Coldstreams is striking evidence of the changes which war's pressure can bring.

German regiments, the correspondents tell us, are being officered more and more by men promoted from the ranks. Questions of social position and financial eminence go by the board in time of stress. War, dragging its human playthings back to the elemental, sheds along the route the mere externals of aristocracy and caste. There is grim irony in the fact that this greatest of crimes against the brotherhood of man promotes even temporarily, a democracy a brotherhood, which peace could not produce. —New York Tribune.

SANDY BEND JUSTICE

By M. QUAD

Copyright, 1915, by the McClure Newspaper Syndicate.

"This yere court bein' open," said Judge Hoke of Sandy Bend as he felt behind him to see if his guns were handy—"this yere court bein' open and the goddess of jestice bein' ready for bizness, I will call the case of Lee Hung, who is charged with stealin' a pickax from the camp of Jim Robinson. Thar ain't any need of lawyers or witnesses, fur I saw the critter myself as he cum to town with the tool on his shoulder. We are not goin' to ax why he stole it, kase that ain't our bizness. Jim Robinson saw him when he picked it up and fired three shots arter him and never teched a ha'r. In one way this court feels that she orter let that heathen go his way to pay off Jim fur bein' such a poor shot. It's jest possible that the critter mistook that pickax fur a mewl or a bag of flour, but that can't count in his favor. Why he didn't hide the tool is nuthin' to this court nor the statoots of this state. What we hev got to look at ar' the fact that he stole it and that Jim Robinson had the gall to cum to me when I was busy in my Red Dog saloon and holler for a warrant."

"I wanted to go accordin' to law," explained the plaintiff as he stood up.

"Waal, ye went that way, Jim, and I'll give yer plenty of it. Lee Hung, durn yer hide, I'm goin' to fine ye $20. That would be purty steep fur a white man, but it's my dooty to crush the heathen whenever I gits a show. Jim, you not only had three shots at the Chinyman, but missed him every time and then bothered me fur an hour. You'll hev to cum down with the costs.

"We now hev afore us the case of Joe Parker versus Hank Scott, and the lawyers needn't crowd to the front to do any talkin'. Joe had a minin' claim on Paradise hill, and as he was lyin' in his shanty the other night mighty nigh dead with colic in walks Hank and sez the claim jest suits him and he's goin' to jump it. He picks up the sufferin' Joe and carries him out and dumps him down on the rocks and then takes hull possession and begins to sing religious hymns. Joe is tied up with colic, but he has two guns to use. Does he use 'em? Does he ax Providence to relieve him of that colic fur ten seconds while he kin fill Hank Scott full of lead. Not a bit of it. He jests shuts his eyes and cries like a baby as Hank lugs him out. An hour later his colic is gone. But does he shoot? Does he make an effort to recover his own? He don't. He walks three miles on a mighty dark night to rout me out and demand jestice. He shall hev it. He ar' fined $50 and costs. Hank Scott, stand up. Nobody but a duffer would take advantage of a man bent double with miner's colic, and I shall fine ye $10. What was ye achin' to say, Pete Holden?"

"I wanted to say, your honor," began the lawyer—"I wanted to say that my client"—

"The next case on the docket presents pecoolier sarcumstapces. This yere court, who is a court when he is out of court and all the time, was a-ridin' out to Big Bar the other day on his cayuse when he meets up with a Chinyman who had found a twenty ounce nugget. When this court had hefted that nugget and was sure all was solid stuff he suggested to the heathen his willingness to exchange his cayuse fur it. I don't go fur to say that the hoss was hardly wuth it, but he was a legal hoss, so to speak, and that heathen could hev flung on a heap of style in the saddle. Did it strike him that way? Not any. He jest drawed his head down between his shoulders and suddenly lost speech. As this yere court feels that he knows what's good fur Chinymen, he got off his cayuse and laid hands on that heathen to git the nugget away. Will it be believed yere in this nineteenth century that the wall eyed son of a gun kicked this court on the nose and kicked him on the shin? Such was the case, and while this court was temporarily disabled the heathen got away. It's a case of contempt of court and a mighty bad one. It has taken us four days to find the Chinyman, and, what's wuss, he's hid the nugget. If a court can't maintain its dignity then it's no court at all. The vardict is guilty, and the Chinyman must pay a fine of $50 and $23 costs. The constable will tie him to the stovepipe and keep him thar till he squar's up.

"The last case shows that what they calls civilization is knockin' the spots off this kentry. Tom Wharton, he goes over to Dead Men's valley and steals a hoss. He gits halfway back when he is overtaken by a crowd and hung to a limb. After the crowd has gone the rope breaks and Tom cums to life and crawls away. Two days later he cums to me and whines fur jestice. He wants the leader of the gang arrested. What fur? Fur not providin' a stouter rope! Tom was reglarly hung. Bill Choate, who led the gang and furnished the rope, is yere, but this court feels that he did the best he could under the sarcumstances. The rope 'peared to be a stout one, and Tom had got through kickin' when he left. Tom Wharton has suffered and wants jestice, but I can't see whar he is to git it. It's a case of whar nobody in particular is to blame. The costs in this case ar' $7, which will be divided between the plaintiff and defendant, and if the pa'r hev got good hoss sense they'll shake hands and foller the percession across the creek and treat the crowd. That's all—skase the script."

Congress Clerks Are Pegging Away

Adjournment of Congress has not by any means brought to an end the work of the hundred or more clerks and secretaries in the big white office building of the Senate. Most of them work steadily from morning until late afternoon, as usual. They have been clearing up the routine mail which accumulated during the closing days of the session, and answering the regular stream of letters which pour in upon a Senator's desk regardless of times and seasons.

Most important of the work which these left-behind clerks and secretaries transact is the holding of the political pulse. A Presidential year is approaching. Every Senator feels himself bound to keep in touch with the party machinery, and at the same time to be continually writing to friends and acquaintances throughout his State, upon various party problems. There are suffragists to be encouraged, placated or suppressed, as the case may be. There are anti-saloon enthusiasts to be dealt with. There are business men's organizations, labor organizations, church organizations and big associations of farmers, each wanting some particular policy advanced, and each suggesting that the Senator take up their cause in the next session of Congress as a means of making it a campaign issue.

River and harbor appropriation matters are another item on the day's program. The bill passed this year appropriating $30,000,000 for river and harbor work gave to the War Department Board of Engineers the authority to distribute the expenditure of this huge fund. Some 207 new projects were granted a survey or resurvey, while the remainder of the money was to be spent on the continuance of improvements now under way, or on the maintenance of present works.

Every Senator has an interest in seeing that his State is not slighted in this distribution. His secretary must keep watch of the hearings on the various groups of projects and report promptly to his chief any sign of unfavorable action. His correspondence on this subject alone is enough to keep him in town for weeks after the Senator goes home to rest.

Then there are complaints as to homestead law administration or reclamation act difficulties, from Western States, and letters of anxiety over cotton shipments to Europe from the South and quantities of letters on labor legislation, rural credits, the workings of the Federal reserve bank system and the prospective work of the Federal Trade Commission from every quarter of the country.

If the comparative number of letters on various topics may be taken as a safe indication of what the people are thinking about, national prohibition and the unemployment question are going to be prominent issues in the national conventions next year. Republican and Democratic constituencies are seemingly in a real stir over the liquor question. The success of the "drys" in various State Legislatures during the winter have given encouragment to almost every "dry" to write to his Senator about it. Instead of sticking to State-by-State attacks upon the liquor business, they went to Congress to put a national consitutional amendment before the people establishing Nation-wide prohibition.

The suffragists are only slightly behind in the competition for notice. The answers sent them this summer from the various offices are in general much more favorable than those sent a year ago.

A third constitutional change which is regularly supported by big bundles of petitions is one forbidding polygamy. These petitions come almost wholly from Protestant churches in the farming communties of the Middle and Southern States. The fact that Congress thinks that it has pretty fully suppressed polygamy by law seems to have no influence to check the flow of these protests against the institution of plural marriage. To these petitioners the senatorial reply is usually one of "careful consideration" and thanks. The petitions are never actually presented in any committee session.

Most of the secretaries and clerks will stay in Washington until May. Then they will go home for a few weeks of rest, or to immediately join their chiefs, to attend to the diverted stream of correspondence. The work of the coming session will then be occupying the minds of their constituents. A whole new act of worries will be catalogued. Until Congress comes back to the Capital there will be all the activity of statesmanship, robbed of its stage-setting of marble halls, bronze eagles, coats of arms of the United States and messengers on the Government payroll.

BENEFIT FOR THE WHOLE FAMILY

Easter Monday is the date set for a benefit performance in aid of Mrs. Edward Whorl, whose husband has been ill for many months. Manager Darleigh has arranged the date at the Quirk and he will see to it that special pictures and music are provided for the afternoon and evening.

Mrs. Whorl and children are deserving of aid and, without a doubt a handsome sum of money for her use will be the result of the entertainment.

Tickets for the show are now on sale at the stores of J. R. Sullivan, Roberts & Wood, W. C. Morgan. V. C. Lewis and A. L. Warner. Tickets call for the small investment of 10 cents. adv.

"LIFE OF THE SAVIOUR"

"The Life of Our Saviour", in 7 reels, a wonderfully comprehensive photo drama contained in some nine thousand feet of handsomely colored Pathe Freres film, will be presented at the Quirk Theatre, tonight, and in conjunction with it will be rendered appropriate sacred music descriptive of the various scenes as they are shown.

The compilation of this chronology of the Master during His journey on earth is truly an achievement worthy of the highest praise as it truthfully and graphically portrays, with grace and dignity, the sufferings and final triumph of Him who died that others might receive Eternal Life.

Of the characters in the drama, suffice it is to say that they are one and all keenly alive to the seriousness of their subject and that never once are they guilty of the least indiscretion. One is led by the seriousness of the action to forget its nature and to accept it as the true drama actually being unfolded before his very eyes. Balcony, 5c; Main Floor, 10c.

BATTLE OF YPRES

Published by Permission

By WILL IRWIN

THE PIVOT AT LA BASSEE

The breaking point was near when, on October 11, the first of the main British force detrained at St. Omer. Not only the German outposts but even strong forces of the main body had reached in some places as far south as a line drawn from Calais parallel with the Great Line. The Belgians and the French Territorials resisted with what force they had; but their resistance grew irregular. "It's guerilla warfare, that's what is," reported a "sniping" Canadian correspondent who, in early October, got out to the lines and miraculously returned to Calais unarrested.

The English army found its task cut out for it. They must drive advanced German forces back to a line already established in the minds of their strategists—to complete that all-important operation of closing the siege of Germany. They must keep in touch with the French at La Bassee; they must establish touch with the Belgians and Rawlinson's division on the west. General Sir Horace Smith-Dorrien's Second Corps, detraining at St. Omer on the 11th, went immediately into action at the toughest point in the whole campaign—La Bassee. That village held out against every attack—it is holding still. It became, as the campaign went on, only a pivot from which the English forces turned the Germans back from France and Flanders. For a week the successive British detachments were detraining and going forward at once to fight and to die. By the 19th the English army was fighting a scattering, confused-looking battle whose focus was Ypres, the beautiful old capital of French Flanders. By that time, also, the Belgian army, which had been given a brief breathing-spell by the Germans, was desperately engaged in holding the Yser at the point of the line nearest the sea. The bridge-head of the Yser, the critical point for them, had been lost and won again; falling back on the immemorial defensive measure of the Flemish the Belgains had floored the country; the extreme left of the line was secure.

Rawlinson, stretching his lines beyond all security, was fighting a desperate battle to hold Ypres and to maintain touch with the Belgians and their French reinforcements to his left. By the 20th that line had grown perilously thin; by the 20th, too, the German masses were coming on faster and faster; and they were beginning to strike at his weakest spot—his touch with the French and Belgians to his left.

EVERY WAR RULE BROKEN

Meantime Sir John French, even before the whole army was detrained, had swung his main forces through a series of maneuvres which, we suspect, the soldier of the future will study for their brilliance and for their defiance of military tradition. Visitors returning to London in October described General Headquarters and the town which surrounded it as "the quietest spot in Europe." Though the guns sounded everywhere in the distance, peasants were ploughing, boys going fishing, housewives scrubbing the doorsteps just as usual. Herat of the town and hope of the Empire was that house where this small, compact, blue-eyed man with his mixture of French and Irish blood which means genius, his overlay of English blood which means stability, this old beau sabreur transformed by the change of warfare to a thinking machine, was solving a situation which was like twenty chess problems at once. Of mornings he worked at his desk; of afternoons he held council or visited the lines; at luncheon, at tea, at dinner, he thrashed it out with his officers. "He violated," says a friendly critic, "every rule of warfare—and succeeded." They were judicious violations. This is a new warfare; some of the old rules do not hold. He was making the traditions of a new warfare.

RAIN OF GERMAN SOLDIERS

So complex is this new warfare that a layman cannot follow the separate actions which made the great result. Indeed, French's own despatches, written at a time when he must conceal much from the enemy, fail to describe these actions in any detail. Every day he let loose a separate hell against the increasing German hordes at his front. French was bending all these complex things to one end—to make untenable any German position below the line drawn across Flanders and northern France by the strategists of the Allies. In all this torn, bleeding province of fire and death the action rose to separate battles which would have been famous in old wars. The soixante-quinze guns of the French artillery support, the rifles and bayonets of the English Third Corps, took the hill of Mont des Cats; did it, too, against odds. That same Third Corps—always the attacking force, and almost always against odds—went forward in a week to Armentieres, a gain of twenty miles or more. The Second Corps, fighting on the right of the Third, made a narrower turn. It pivoted on La Bassee; its left went forward ten miles to a point where it was in touch with the Third.

So as the critical 20th approached the main force under Sir John French extended for some twenty-five miles from before La Bassee to a point beyond Ypres; and now the German resistance stiffened and held. Neither the English nor the French could drive much farther. But the line was established. And it was a straight line. Half-formed, insecure, it still reached out and touched that Franco-Belgian defence which ran from the Forest of Houthulst to the sea.

That extreme left of the British line—the point where it joined the line of its Allies—was held by Rawlinson's harassed, over-stretched division. And just then more Germans and still more Germans were rushed down the Belgian railroads. "They seemed to rain down on us everywhere," a spectator has said; but most of all they rained on that weak point to the left.

Now French, "violating every rule of war," had not only drawn the lines of his important Second and Third Corps very thin but he had shot his last bolt of reserves. All the reinforcements available from England had been used in filling out units— this purely intellectual summary has taken no account of the heavy cost in life and limb of these British attacks. The Indian troops, hurried up from Marseilles, had been rushed to the front. The day when they arrived the English forces were hanging on by their eyelids. Someone, I am told, looked back from a trench and saw a solitary outpost, a turbaned, cloaked figure of the desert, very startling in the green, peaceful French landscape, riding over a hill. Back of him nodded the turbans of Sikh cavalry; and the English in the trenches, who seemed past emotion, waved their rifle barrels and cheered. But neither Indians nor French territorials nor French cavalry nor French artillery seemed sufficient.

DOING THE IMPOSSIBLE

Only the First Corps remained out of action. An army does not move in a day; while the Second Corps and the Third had been battering their way through a twenty-five mile advance, the First, under General Sir Douglas Haig, was still coming over from its old position before Soissons. By the 20th they were detrained and ready for the line.

There came that night a special moment of decision for Sir John French; and on his decision perhaps rested the fate of the campaign. He himself has stated it unDramatically in his despatches. Should he use the First to reinforce the Second and Third, thereby securing the ground already won on the right? They were drawn thin, the Second and Third—thin. One day, it is said, French, visiting the lines, talked to a colonel who was hard pressed. "We can't hold out much longer, sir," said the colonel. "It is impossible!" "I want only men who can do the impossible," said French. "Hold!"

The Second and Third were doing the impossible. If any military force since wars began ever needed reinforcements it was this one. But there was the threat beyond Ypres at the Point between the English left and the Franco-Belgian right—a place where the weak spot in the bladder might bulge and, bulging too much, break. Sir John French, "with the air," someone has said, "of a business man closing a deal," made his decision and turned in for a little sleep. He chose to let the Second Corps and the Third continue with the impossible. He sent the First Corps to the line about the city which has given name to this whole series of actions—Ypres. Almost from the day when they reached the line they became the Iron Corps of the British; and their Commander, General Sir Douglas Haig, stands second only to French in the credit due for winning the Battle of Ypres. They incorporated what was left of Rawlinsons' force; they prepared to dig in and hold.

THE GREAT ASSAULT

Ten days followed in which nothing decisive happened and everything happened. The Germans rocked their attack from side to side, searching for the weak spot. They gained here; they lost there; but the line remained as it had been when Haig moved up his First Corps. The British held on, and continued to dig in.

Then came the 31st—the crucial day for England. The attacks had been growing stronger; across the lines the British heard the Germans singing as though working themselves up, German fashion, to a Berserk courage; captured orders showed that the Kaiser had commanded a great assault which should clear the way to Calais and to Paris.

Before the sun was high on that morning of the 31st a British aviator vol-planed down to his own line with a wing damaged by shrapnel. He dropped from his seat pale and shaken. "A close call?" they asked. "It isn't that!" he said, "it's what I've seen—three corps, I tell you—against our First!" So he jerked out his story. He had seen the roads and ridges like ant-hills and ant-runs with men; he had seen new batteries going into position; he had seen, far away, the crawling grey serpents which were still more German regiments going to their slaughter. "And we're so thin from up there," he said, "and they're so many!" Hard on this came hurried news to headquarters from the front. The German artillery and a massed attack of German infantry had broken the first division of the First Corps near Ypres; the division was going back; the French support was going back. "We must have reinforcements," said the message. "I can give you my two sentries and my headquarters staff," replied French. Disaster after disaster followed. The Royal Scots Fusiliers, remaining too long in a hot place, were for their very valour cut off. The Germans had found new artillery positions, had shelled General Douglas Haig's headquarters. A shell had burst in the house. Haig was outside at the time; but nearly every staff officer of the First Corps was killed or wounded. The army up there was almost headless—was fighting as individuals on primitive fighting instinct.

A day's march away from Ypres is the ford where 2000 years ago Caesar had his close call from the Nervii. That was the battle where Caesar, snatching a shield from a soldier, himself plunged into the thick of things and, acting as line-officer and general all at once, rallied the Roman army. Warfare has changed, but manhood and leadership remain the same. French jumped into his motorcar and rushed to the line of the First Division. He had not so far to go as he thought. The line had retired four miles. Through his glasses he could see the close-locked quadruple ranks of German infantrymen attacking everywhere. And everywhere the English were fighting valiantly, but without method. The line in it to the last man—even the regimental cooks. The officers of infantry and cavalry were fighting with the privates, their servants loading spare rifles behind them.

French, assisted by the able Haig, became a headquarters staff himself. They say that he risked his life twenty times that afternoon, as his motor-car took him from focus of trouble to focus of more trouble. He gave an order here; he encouraged an officer there. In the thickest of that day's fighting he left his motor-car and ran to a wood where a brigade was ging ground. As he rushed in, a wounded private staggered back into his arms. French laid him gently down and went talking to his men, encouraging them, rally them, until they held. He gathered up a part of the broken First Division and threw it at the flank of a German attack which was proceeding on the reckless theory that the English were totally beaten. The Germans broke; the British re-took Gheluvolt on the original line. On this start, and partly by move after move of the closest and yet most daring strategy, but partly by the spirit of an army which begins to see victory, French snatched back the positions lost on that four-mile retirement and rested on the original line.

The English had merely held—technically—really, they had won the climacteric action in that long battle which must determine the future course of this war. The cost of it was no less than the cost of other famous victories. One regiment went into that campaign 1100 strong. They came out but 73. And most of their lost thousand went down that day before Ypres. Another regiment took 1350 men to the western front. They had fewer than 300 when the battle of Ypres was won. Most of them, too, fell in this action of the 31st of October. A famous cavalry brigade went into that action 4,500 strong. It came out decimated; for it had been holding off, alone, a whole army corps of 41,000!

PRUSSIAN GUARD MOWED DOWN

In old wars a battle lasted a day or two; victory came in an hour, and it was all over but the pursuit; the courier went forward to the capital; there was illumination and bell-ringing. In this new war no one, not even the commander, may know the decisive moment; the day of real victory blends into days where the fight still goes on; to none of these modern battles is there as yet an end. The 31st of October was the decisive point of the action before Ypres; but no one knew it then. The attacks and counter-attacks, the digging in, went on. French troops began arriving in force to strengthen and make sure the line.

Nevertheless, the Germans had one more great assault on their program. Ypres is the old historic capital of French Flanders; and the British observers noted a curious fact about the operations against Ypres. However heavy the German bombardment, the famous old Cloth Hall, the most beautiful building of its kind in Flanders, went unscatched by shells. It was saved, we know now, for a particular purpose. Kaiser Wilhelm himself was moving forward with a special force to a special assault which should finally and definitely break the Allied line at Ypres. To do this was to clear Flanders of the Allies; and then, as by custom he might, he intended to annex Belgium in the Cloth Hall of Ypres. He came with his own Prussian Guard; it was that Guard which, on the 15th, led another terrible massed attack. It was no less vigorous than the attack of the 31st; but the English, reinforced now by the French, met it better. Again the dense masses poured in; again the very officers fired until their rifles grew too hot to hold. When, that night, the strength of the German attack was spent, the better part of the Prussian Guard lay dead in a wood—lay, at some places, in ranks eight deep. The second and lesser climax was past. A fortnight more, and the line from La Bassee to the sea had been [illegible] roughly as the line from Switzerland to La Bassee. It had cost England 50,000 men out of 120,000 engaged—a proportion of loss greater than any previous war ever knew. It had cost the French and Belgians 70,000. It probably cost the Germans 375,000. That is a half-million in all. The American Civil War has been called the most terrible in modern history. In this one long battle Europe lost as many men as the North lost in the whole Civil War.

It happened so close to the capital of Great Britain that officers in a hurry are now making the trip from London to Headquarters in four hours. It happened in an age when intelligence travels by lightning. It happened in a day of that age when every mind of the Western world was waiting hungrily for news. Yet the real news—the news that the battle of Ypres was decisive, on the western front, that it may rank with Waterloo and Blenheim for glory and for effect—that news is coming out only now, months after the event. In such strange times do we live!

(The End)

Takes a Sip of Tacks.

While she attempted to take a drink from what she thought was a glass of water while in the dark at her home in Point township, Northumberland county, Pa., Miss Alice Rhoades, eighteen years old, swallowed several hundred tacks and pins. She was taken to the Mary M. Packer hospital, Sunbury.

FULTON HIGH BALL SCHEDULE

Captain Bray Believes In Material Coming to the Front; 9 Home Games

At a meeting held at Fulton high school yesterday morning, the baseball boom for the coming season was launched with much enthusiasm. Leonard Roy, an alumnus of the local school, who will coach the team this year, addressed the undergraduates on "School Spirit and the Support of Athletics," and judging from the manner in which his few words were received the team this year will be supported as no other aggregation in the history of the school.

Manager Harold O'Brien has completed a schedule of seventeen games, all with teams of strong calibre, and the games are about evenly divided between the home grounds and those abroad. Captain Bray has already commenced the work of rounding up the candidates and there seems to be a wealth of good material at the school this year in every department, except the pitching.

Sylvester, the sensational hurler of last season's team, will be lost to the squad this year through graduation. Cavanaugh, who held down the left garden position last season, and Wilcox, second base, have also been graduated.

O'Brien, who acted as relief pitcher last year, will probably handle most of the mound work this year, although Frawley, Pullen and Webb are going out for the position and all three new candidates seem to have plenty of stuff.

While arrangements were under way for securing the City Hall basketball court for indoor practise until the weather moderates, Manager O'Brien stated yesterday that it will be impossible to get the court. Consequently the team will be obliged to face the cool breezes during the first two weeks of drill. Coach Roy has ordered all candidates to report on the grounds in the rear of the seminary on Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday next, in the afternoon.

The financing of the team will be well taken care of this year by the entertainment to be given by the school pupils April 15 and 16 at The Quirk theatre, for the joint benefit of the athletic association and the public library. The team is also selling season tickets to the home games for a nominal sum and seventy-five of these have already been contracted for. They will be put on sale when the school opens after the Easter vacation.

Keeler, last year's captain; Bray, catcher; Pullen, outfielder, and Caffery, first baseman, veterans of last year's team, will be on hand when the roll is called next week and with these men as a nucleus, Coach Roy expects to do great things. The other candidates include Frawley, Pullen, Webb and O'Brien, pitchers; Bray, catcher; Barker, Wood and Caffrey, first base; Martin, second base; Keeler, third base; Carner, Hunter, Judd, LaPointe, Lynch, McKenna, Reynolds, Sanford, Scholtz, Sullivan and Thompson, outfielders.

The schedule is one of the best ever compiled for the local team, comprising nine games at the Athletic park grounds and eight games abroad. The schedule follows:

April 30—Baldwinsville at home.

May 1—Morrisville at Morrisville; May 5—Syracuse Freshmen at home; May 7—Syracuse North High at Syracuse; May 8—Oswego at home; May 14—Solvay at home; May 15—Auburn High School at Auburn; May 19—Oswego Normal at home; May 21—Skaneateles at Skaneateles; May 22—Morrisville at home; May 28—Oswego at Oswego; May 29—Skaneateles at home.

June 2—Baldwinsville at Baldwinsville; June 5—Alumni at home; June 11—Oswego Normal at Oswego; June 12—Syracuse North High at home.

TREES FOR THIS SECTION

Federal Department Recommends Various Kinds for Planting

What kind of trees shall we plant to beautify our grounds?

What shrubs would be suited to our school yards?

These are questions which are frequently asked the United States Department of Agriculture. Soil and climatic conditions differ so greatly in the different sections of the United States that in answering such questions special consideration has to be given each section. The Department's specialists have prepared a special list of trees and shrubs suited for general use on private grounds streets, privatee parks, and school yards for each of five general divisions of the United States.

In New York division the Department recommends:

The beauty of a shade tree depends upon its normal and symetrical growth. In order to insure this, before planting cut off the ends of all broken or mutilated roots; remove all side branches save upon evergreens, so that a straight whip-like stalk alone remains. Dig holes at least two feet in diameter and one foot deep in good soil, and make them four feet across in poor soil. The sides of holes should be perpendicular and the bottom flat. Break up soil in bottom of the hole to the depth of the length of a spade blade. Place two or three inches of fine top soil, free from sods or other decomposing organic matter, in the bottom of the hole. On top of this place the roots of the tree, spread them as evenly as possible over the bottom of the hole, and cover with two or three inches of fine top soil as before. Tramp firmly with the feet and fill the hole with good earth, leaving the surface loose and a little higher than the surface of the surrounding soil. When the work of planting is completed, the tree should stand about two inches deper than it stood in the nursery.

State Bird Day

The State Department of Education has appointed next Friday, April 2, as State Bird Day, especially in the public schools. In announcing this event, John M. Clarks, director of the State museum, says:

Do you ask why the children should put aside their other lessons just to talk about, watch and listen for the birds? Suppose we had no birds—suppose that these blessings which brighten as they taken their flight in the autumn never came back. You would miss their happy welcome of the spring, no doubt, their darting colors among the trees and all the familiar everyday acquaintance which makes the summer summer. But it would mean more than that. Should they stay away, your orchards would be stripped bare of leaves and fruit, your fields of grain would droop, withered and hopeless, the forests would turn to tangles of naked boughs, there would be no grass in the fields, no bread on your tables, no milk in your cups, no meat on your plates. And is it the birds, these song birds about us, the robin that pecks our cherries and strawberries, the crow and the blackbird that steal the corn, the hawk that scoops down upon the chickens—these and the rest of the birds, that meat—that actually keep us alive? It is in very truth. It is they, the birds, including even those the short sight of our laws still looks upon as public enemies, that stand between humanity and starvation, for it is the insectsthat would drive us off the earth, would put the human race to death, if it were not that the birds stood between us and them. Go out on April 2d and thank the birds that you are alive, and then resolve that you and those whom you can influence will do all in theeir power to protect and encourage our bird life of every kind. So make our Bird Day count for something in this State. No lesson in the school can be so important as this one: The birds stand between us and destruction."

ALBANY LETTER DAY BY DAY

By FREDERIC T. CARDOZE

Albany, March 27—Monthly sessions of the Legislature of one week duration, are favored by Assemblyman Harold . Hinman, Republican leader of the Assembly. Assemblyman Hinman is a delegate to the Constitutional Convention and he will present his views covering his ideas when the delegates meet and settle down to work.

Considerable has been said concerning biennial sessions of the Legislature and comparsion has been made with the work of the law-making bodies of other states which meet but once in two years, but these arguments do not sway Assemblyman Hinman from his purpose. He says that the Legislature of New York State has far more business to consider that the average State and therefore it is necessary that it meet each year. He is opposed to the present method of dealing with legislation, however, holding that too little consideration is given bills. He explains the reason by pointing out that the number of bills are becoming more numerous each year and declaring that it is practically an impossibility for a member to read and digest the mass of legislation which accumulates from week to week.

"I shall recommend to the delegates to the Constitutional Convention" says Assemblyman Hinman," that there be twelve meetings each year of the legislature. This will mean about three months of legislation, for I do not think the Senate and Assembly should be in session for more than one week at a time. The members would thus have three weeks within which to consider and digest the bills which have been introduced during the week."

Assemblyman Hinman suggests that the bills introduced during the January session, be passed or defeated in February, that those introduced in February, be acted upon the following month and so on until the year has rolled around. He says that in all probability there would be no sessions in July or August.

"If monthly sessions of the Legislature were to be held I have no doubt but that men of influence and ability of the highest type would be attracted to the legislature. It is far easier for a busy man to give a week to legislative duties than to neglect his business and come to Albany for a three or four months solid stretch of law-making. I think that the salaries of legislators should be raised to $2,500."

According to Assemblyman Hinman, bureaucratic powers, possessed by certain State departments should be eliminated. He holds that the legislature should legislate for all departments and says that under the present method this is impossible. Several months intervene between the adjourning of a legislature and the convening of another.

There would no doubt be additional expense to the State were the monthly sessions proposed by Assemblyman Hinman to be carried out. The clerk hire would doubtless jump and the other incidental expenses increase by yirtue of the year around session. This version is raised by many of whom some are legislators.

The plan of increasing the salaries of members of the legislature was tried several years ago when a referendum was submitted to the people, but by a most decisive vote it was decided that the amount at present drawn, $1,500, should stand. It is pretty generally believed notwithstanding that $1,500 is too small an amount to compensate men who spend from four to five months each year at the State Capitol legislating for the people of the State.

CHICAGO MANUFACTURER COMING NEXT WEEK

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE PLEASE TAKE NOTICE

The spirit of competition in Fulton, sore spent, passed from its battered old body last night with a mighty commotion. The discovery was made in the business section last night about 9.30.

The manager of one of Fulton's leading shops with an assistant while completing some tasks heard the disturbance and mistook it for a burglar's attempt.

A hasty exit was made to the street and the one lone pedestrian, chuckling, responded as he was hailed to the rescue.

The cellar was investigated but an all-sereno condition prevailed therein. Then as the relieved manager turned to bestow thanks upon the stranger, behold, there stood—no, not a competitor, but a fellow-merchant beaming forth his appreciation of the situation.

Three rounds of hearty laughs followed the spirit in its flight as it disappeared over the cupalo on city hall.

Andy Pryor and his six trained bears and Mme. Evelyn, and her performing lions, bears, leopards and panthers will appear at each performance as added features to this wonderful bill. ITALY BOASTS OF FINE ARMY; HER NAVY ALSO IS FORMIDABLE Total Land War Strength of 3,409,000 Men—Valiant Dreadnoughts to the Fore.

ITALY'S total army war strength is roughly estimated at 3,409,000 men, but of these over 2,000,000 comprise what is known as the territorial militia, which is practically untrained. There are twelve army corps, each district having two infantry divisions. Behind the three, normally the corps on the Austrian frontier has been greatly strengthened, while other corps the beginning of [illegible] to their full war strength.

The organization of Italy's permanent army includes ninety-six regiments of line infantry, twelve regiments of bersaglieri and eight Alpine regiments, all with battalions. There are twenty-four regiments of cavalry and thirty-six of field artillery. The army also has a regiment of horse artillery, two regiments of mountain artillery, ten regiments of coast artillery, two of fortress artillery and six regiments of engineers. A large battalion of aviators has been organized in the last few years for use in war.

Italy also has a fairly large navy. It comprises twenty-one battleships, ten armored cruisers, thirteen protected cruisers, seventy-seven torpedo boats, about thirty torpedo boat destroyers and about twenty submarines. Incidentally Italy was the first Mediterranean power to begin the construction of battleships of the Dreadnought type. The newest Italian Dreadnoughts, the Andrea Doria and Caio Duilio, have completed their speed and artillery trials.

It is likely that they will be put in commission by May 1. The completion of the two new vessels brings the number of Italy's Dreadnoughts up to six. The first vessel of this class in the Italian navy was the Dante Alighieri, completed in January, 1913. Four super-Dreadnoughts, carrying fifteen inch guns each, are projected.

Are Sister Ships.

The Andrea Doria and Caio Duilio are sister ships, begun respectively in March and April, 1912, and launched in the spring of 1913. Their general specifications are identical with those of the Conte di Cavour, Leonardo da Vinci and Giulio Cesare, which were laid down in 1910 and are now in commission. The length of these ships on the water line is 575 feet. They have a displacement of 22,540 tons and an indicated speed of twenty-three knots. They are driven by Parsons turbines. The protection comprises a complete belt of armor ten inches thick amidships, tapering to 4.7 inches thick at the ends, with heavily armored turrets, barbettes and conning tower and an armored deck. Each of the new vessels carries thirteen twelve-inch, six-inch six-inch and eighteen three-inch guns and three torpedo tubes.

The three ships begun in 1910 have eighteen 4.7 inch guns instead of the six inch guns on the later vessels. The new vessels are intended to have a complement of 1,000 officers and men each.

"The first and second categories of the ten classes from 1886 to 1895 are to be assigned to the first line troops; the third category of the same classes, besides the three categories of the ten classes from 1876 to 1885, are to be assigned to the mobile and territorial militia."

Thus all able-bodied men between the ages of twenty and forty are to be included. Four classes—those of 1892, 1893, 1894, 1895—are now with the colors. The three classes recently trained and sent home are liable to immediate mobilization.

All Italians are liable to military service for nineteen years from the age of twenty. Two years are spent with the colors, six "en conge," four in the mobile militia and seven in the territorial militia. In case of general mobilization the peace strength of 15,172 officers and 289,448 men is increased to a total of 3,433,150 as follows:

Officers	41,882
First line troops	289,448
Second line troops	491,697
Mobile militia	328,631
Territorial militia	2,281,392
Total	3,433,150

The categories of each year's recruits are regulated by family conditions specified by law. Those belonging to the first category pass only one year with the colors, but must pay about $250 to $300 annually thereafter for exemption. This privilege ceases in case of a call for general mobilization such as is now imminent in Italy.

Picturesque Alpine Troops.

When the armies of Italy are hurled into the great European conflict some of the most interesting and picturesque actors of the world's war stage will take up their parts.

All eyes will be upon the Bersaglieri, with their plumes of cocks' feathers, and the Alpine troops who march up perpendicular cliffs with more ease than they walk on level ground. And there are the royal carabineers and the Royal Piedmont regiment of cavalry, both holding celebrated positions among all the fighting forces of the world.

Favorites among them all are the Bersaglieri, called "the most picturesque of the corps d'elite of the armies of the world." The Bersaglieri consist of twelve regiments, each of three battalions, with one reserve company. They are the fleetest infantrymen in the world.

Chose the Poorest Material.

This corps was created by General Lamarmora, one of the founders of the Italian national army. The general asked the king for the worst soldiers in the service so that he could mold them according to his own plans. His first and chief plan was to make his men mentally keen and resourceful. At the same time he wished that they be thoroughly active physically.

In a peculiar way the great general went about training his men. One of his ideas was to have all the doors secretly locked when the men were in quarters and to have the first dinner bugle sounded. A moment later the second dinner bugle sounded. The men, in obedience to the call, rushed with their pans in their hands to the doors. The doors were all locked of course.

But the men must get their mess. The orders were to prepare themselves immediately after the second call, get their rations and return to quarters. There was nothing left to do but make ropes of blankets and sheets and let themselves down from the windows while they held the pans in their teeth. They got their allowance of the usual thick soup and bread. The bread was easy; it went into their pockets. But the soup! There was no other way; they went up as they came down, pans in mouths. Some got back with the most of their soup; some got back with half of it; some got back with the pan wet. But out of 700 men in one trial all but two got back up the improvised ropes.

The Bersaglieri have continued to be a national institution. Their traditions of readiness in emergency have not been allowed to die.

No less remarkably trained and no less picturesque are the Alpine troops. The mountains are their home. Whole regiments have been drilled in all the difficulties of battling above the clouds or on the steep sides of cliffs, where only avalanches are supposed to travel. In the maneuvers are to be seen long files of men, small, looking like flies on the wall of some terrible precipice, dragging inch by inch some big field gun by means of cables and pulleys.

The whole idea of such training is that some day it would be necessary to meet an enemy equally daring and skillful among the dangerous Alpine solitudes. Perhaps that day is now at hand, and the Carnic and Rhaetian Alps on the border between Italy and Austria may see battles most strange in comparison with the ordinary aspects of warfare. Here may be aerial battles of another kind, scarcely less thrilling and novel.

Swim Deep Rivers.

Were it not for these most picturesque parts of the Italian army there would be more cheers for the Royal Piedmont regiment, one of the most celebrated corps, a corps whose favorite maneuvering feat is swimming deep rivers on horseback. Those who have witnessed these maneuvers tell of seeing a prince of the house of Savoy plunge into the river Arno at Florence at the head of his hussars and the entire regiment swim across, each trooper with his arm about his trained charger's neck.

Then there would be more eyes for the royal carabineers, soldiers who are chosen with the utmost care and who are greatly esteemed for their noble traditions. The carabineers are composed of all the military corps which have charge of the public peace and order in the different provinces of the kingdom.

Only a few years ago the Italian soldiers had a taste of real war. In 1906 there was trouble with Emperor Menelik of Abyssinia. Italy had dreamed of a protectorate and a vast African empire. Honorable defeats at the hands of the fierce Abyssinians soon turned into complete disaster. But the Italians came back home with a few lessons which they turned to good account in the brief victorious war with Turkey.

OFFICERS TELL OF CARIB'S LOSS

American Steamer Found Path Strewn With Mines.

TORN IN HALF BY EXPLOSION

Three of the Engine Room Crew Died at Their Posts—Those on Board Had Barely Time to Launch Lifeboats Before the Carib Began to Settle. Animal Pets Lost.

Details of the sinking of the Clyde line steamship Carib in the North sea were brought to New York by her captain, Edgar L. Cole, who arrived on the Holland-American line steamship Nieuw Amsterdam from Rotterdam, accompanied by five of his officers and engineers. The Carib sailed from Savannah with a cargo of 4,600 bales of cotton for Bremen, which were insured for $235,863.

When the Carib reached Dover on Feb. 16 the weather was so rough that she had to anchor in the Downs off Deal for shelter until Feb. 19, when a British naval officer came on board from a scout cruiser to examine the papers. Then Captain Cole started across the North sea for the Hook of Holland without a pilot. The ship arrived safely off the mouth of the river Maas the following afternoon, where a Dutch pilot came on board and agreed to take the vessel into Bremen.

At 11 a. m. on Feb. 22 the Carib was ten miles north by west of Norderney light, making for the mouth of the Weser river, when she hit a mine which blew a hole in her starboard side amidship.

There was no sound of an explosion, the officers said, only a shock and the inrush of the water through the big gap in the vessel's hull. Captain Cole was standing on deck by his room, and the pilot was alongside the quartermaster at the wheel giving directions to him how to steer. Several mines had been sighted in the preceding twenty-four hours, and it was thought that the danger zone was passed.

Reported Boilers Had Burst.

Directly after the shock the chief engineer [illegible] on deck and reported to the captain that the boilers had burst, killing the third assistant engineer, William Bazell, and two Spanish firemen. There was no time to save money or effects. The crew had barely time to launch the lifeboats before the Carib began to settle. Captain Cole took charge of the starboard boat with sixteen men, and the chief officer steered the other lifeboat, containing twelve men. When the boats had pulled clear of the vessel a Boston terrier named Sport ran to the rail and barked mournfully, while Tiger, the ship's pet Persian cat, ran swiftly along the top deck to the captain's room. The men were anxious to rescue the animals, but it was too dangerous a task, and they went down with the ship. Before the boat lost sight of her the Carib's upper deck rail was awash.

After pulling for an hour and a half the two boatloads of men were picked up by the German patrol vessel Anna Busse and landed at Wilhelmshaven, from which port they were sent by train to Rotterdam.

"When the Carib sailed from this side the instructions set out through the embassy in Washington by the German government of the course to be taken by American vessels to avoid striking mines had not been made public," said one of the officers.

"We first encountered floating mines on Feb. 20 off North Hinder lightship, and between 9 a. m. and noon we counted thirteen of them near the ship. This made all hands feel uncomfortable, but it had to be faced. All we could do was to swing the port starboard lifeboats out clear of the rail, with provisions, water, compass and lantern lighted, all ready for an emergency.

"After the boilers burst one of the firemen, who fought his way through the scalding steam to the deck, said he was standing close to the third assistant engineer at the time and believed the man must have been blown up through the deck with pieces of the mine and the boilers. Other firemen and coal passers had narrow escapes from death and reached the deck in an exhausted condition, but there was no time to think of their sufferings, as the Carib was sinking beneath their feet. She had broken in halves from the upper deck down below the water line, and the breach rapidly widened as the sea poured in with irresistible force."

The Carib was a steamship of 2,500 gross tonnage and was for many years in the Santo Domingo service of the Clyde line from New York. She was chartered with other American coastwise steamships to carry cotton to Germany after the war started.

Hits on Typhus Preventive.

Through a mistake of a laboratory worker in filling a bottle with anisol instead of anise oil Professor Sigmond Fraenkel of the University of Vienna has discovered a preparation which kills the parasite that transmits the infection of spotted typhus. Anisol is one of the derivatives of anise oil. Professor Fraenkel says that the mixture is absolutely effective within ten minutes.

About Sports Generally

(Frank G. Menke, sporting editor of the International News Service, has just arrived in Havana to cover the world's champion fight between Jack Johnson and Jess Willard. The following story is the first of a number that he will cable before the day of the fight.)

Havana, March 26.—The Johnson-Willard fight must be on the level. No faking or suspcion of faking will be tolerated. At the first sign of faking the fight will be stopped by the police, and if they are unable to accomplish this soldiers will be called to perform the task.

This is the ultimatum, direct from President Menocal, that has been served upon promoters of the fight. Anticipating possible rioting if the police unaided tried to stop the fight, the military authorities have been instructed by President Menocal to make adequate preparations for any and all emergencies.

On duty in and about the race track where the fight is to take place there will be the Second Cavalry Regiment, two companies with rapid fire guns and a battalion of infantry.

The money for these men will be furnished by the Government through a special arrangement with the promoters.

The possibility of race riots following the fight has also been considered by the Government. It is believed these troops will be sufficient to quell any outbreaks between the whites and blacks.

"The fight will be permitted if on the level," said President Menocal today. The fighters can battle as hard as they want to. The spectators will be better satisfied if they see great brutality, I suppose.

"But at the first sign of faking we shall stop the fight. No fake will be allowed."

Social standing is cutting no ice in the crowds that are besieging the training camps of Johnson and Willard and watching those two gladiators go through their preliminary work for their championship battle on April 4.

Millionaires rub elbows with the common worker. Women mingle freely with the men. Black and white mix freely with no racial feeling shown. Both fighters are speeding up their training. Hard runs on the road and vigorous work in the gymnasium marked this morning's program. Then the fighters had a short rest, after which they again hit the trail and wound up the day's work with some hard boxing bouts with their training partners. The betting which has been light since the fight was a certainty here, began to get brisker today.

The prevailing odds are about 5 to 2, that Johnson will win, but there is plenty of Willard money in sight at these figures. The public sale of seats began this morning. The promoters are loaded with mail orders from all parts of the United States for choicest ringside seats. These requests total $42,000 already and still the demands are coming in. [illegible] of a referee for the big event will probably be made some time today or tonight. Among the men prominently mentioned as the third man in the ring are Billy Richie and White of New York, Charles Easton of Los Angeles Mat Hinkle of Cleveland and Billy Rocap of Philadelphia.

HOT LINERS

Acting upon the advice of Bill Carrigan, manager of the Red Sox, McNally, ex-Utica infielder, has changed his style at the bat and is showing improvement every day in his batting. When he joined the Bostonians, McNally stood with his feet a little farther apart and also had a sort of spread eagle grig on the bat, which caused him to swing with a jerky motion and which made his batting ineffective. The shift has benefited McNally to a marked degree.

"Do you get any fun out of playing baseball?" Heywood Broun of the New York Tribune asked Fred Merkle as he caught him in a genial moment following a 140-yard drive down the middle of the golf course at Marlin, Tex. His grin faded, but then he smiled again.

"The fans ride you pretty hard," Broun suggested. He nodded.

"No," he said. "I wouldn't call it fun. I have too tough a time out there."

"The tough part of it is," Merkle explained, "that I can't do things other fellows can do without attracting any attention. Little slips that would be excused in other players are burned into me by the crowds. Of course, I make my mistakes with the rest, but I have to do double duty. If any play I'm concerned in goes wrong, I'm the fellow that gets the blame, no matter where the thing went off the line."

"You act as if you didn't mind it much, the roasts and all the rest of it," Broun said.

"I try not to," answered Merkle. "I've been ridden enough to get used to it, but nobody's so thick skinned but what a roast will get under his skin some time or other."

He mused a minute, this man, who has been called "bonehead" by more persons than voted for Woodrow Wilson in the last election and admonished, "Don't forget to touch second," by every smart Alec in eight large cities.

"Yes," said Merkle, "it's a tough job."

NEW LIGHT CAST ON TUBERCULOSIS

Cases In Last Stages Should Have More Care.

DISCHARGED, LATER CURED.

Many In First Stage Dismissed as Symptom Free Have Relapses—Present Tendency to Favor Patients With Early Symptoms of Disease May Not Be Always Wise.

The Lancet of London prints an interesting editorial review of the ultimate results of sanitarium treatment of tuberculosis based on a paper read by Professor Bang at a meeting of the Medical society of Copenhagen. The paper, freely illustrated with statistics, and the long discussion which followed its presentation have been reported in the Hospitalstidende. The paper dealt chiefly with the results of sanitarium treatment estimated many years after the discharge of the patients from the institutions.

"The many tables and statistical analyses displayed by Professor Bang," says the Lancet, "provoked a lively discussion as to the merits of statistics in the estimation of sanitarium results, and he admitted that a detailed knowledge of each case is necessary for the judgment of sanitarium results by the standard of figures. One striking feature of [illegible] prognosis which his figures indicated for working class patients admitted to a sanitarium in the second and third stages of the disease.

"It has long been held that the prognosis in pulmonary tuberculosis is best in the first stage of the disease and declines as the second and third stages are reached. Indeed, this view is so generally regarded as a truism that its accuracy has scarcely been questioned. That it does not embrace the whole truth is shown by Professor Bang, whose figures are obtained from several sanitariums in Denmark, where perhaps more than in any other country sanitarium treatment has been thoroughly tested.

Relapses Are Frequent.

"The relative numbers of patients discharged 'symptom free' from sanitariums do, indeed, fall with the stages of the disease, but when the fate of all the patients is investigated several years later many of the 'symptom free' are found to have relapsed, while patients discharged unimproved in the second and third stages of the disease are often found to have regained their capacity for work.

"Professor Bang showed that only two-thirds of the patients in the first stage, discharged as 'symptom free,' were fit for work several years later. On the other hand, the number of patients in the second stage, discharged as 'symptom free,' had actually been augmented several years later, their ranks being increased by one-third by patients who, though discharged as unfit for work in the second stage of the disease, had ultimately regained their capacity for work.

"This paradoxical result is even more striking in the third stage of the disease. The explanation of this phenomenon is to be found in the faultiness of the present classification of the disease according to its extent, but not according to its virulence, to the patient's power of resistance and to many other factors. In many cases patients are classed in the second or third stage, although on admission to a sanitarium the disease is practically quiescent. Professor Bang suggests that the present tendency to favor patients in the first stage of the disease in preference to patients in the other stages when sanitarium accommodation is limited may not be always wise.

"Though the patients in the latter stages have hitherto been regarded as incurable and treated with scant attention, he urges that they should in the future be regarded more hopefully and given the chance of sanitarium treatment, even though this be only for a short time. His observation that patients often relapse who are discharged from a sanitarium with the disease arrested in its first stage, whereas others often recover who are discharged unimproved in the second stage, is not at first sight flattering to sanitarium treatment.

"His estimate of the value of the present methods of classification of the disease is also deprecatory, and, as one speaker during the discussion cannily suggested, the most reliable classification would be the following: (1) Patients that recover and (2) those that do not."

At the height of a thousand feet she got a bad scare when the machine tilted. She pulled a turquoise ring from her finger and threw it away, having heard it was bad luck to wear the stone.

PURIFYING THE WATER SUPPLY

MECHANICAL SEPARATION.

Essentials to a Pure Water Supply Consist of Proper Catchment Areas, an Impounding Basin, a Filtering Plant, a Pumping Station and a Distributing System.

Among the basic and fundamental functions of a city there is none of greater importance than that of water supply, writes Frank Koester in "Modern City Planning and Maintenance." However beautiful and attractive a city may be made, if it runs a befouled and death dealing fluid through its water mains it is but a whitened sepulcher and a mockery.

No city without a water purifying system, unless it has a source of naturally pure water, can in reality have any claims to being considered a civilized place of residence. Millions are spent on pumping plants, yet but little goes for purification. An evidence of the fear in which the water of many cities is held is shown by the numerous and highly prosperous so called spring water companies. The amount of money spent by the individual members of the public of any large city for such water would undoubtedly suffice for a purification plant for the whole water [illegible]

The [illegible] From city to city without fear of illness as a result of drinking water, but the traveler in America is in danger, especially in certain parts of the country.

The essentials of a pure water supply consist of properly controlled catchment areas to collect the precipitation, an impounding storage basin, a filtering plant and if the supply is not by gravity to the consumer a pumping station and finally the distributing system. For some cities artesian wells may take the place of catchment areas.

The water at no time should be subject to contamination, especially after being filtered. Where open reservoirs are used they should be so protected that no possible access can be had to them except by the officials and employees.

The purification of water is accomplished by a number of different processes adapted to the different kinds of water to be treated. Such processes may be briefly classified as follows:

Mechanical separation, which is accomplished either by gravity in the form of sedimentation or by adhesion and screening, as with scrubbers, filters and screens. This method is the one most widely used.

Sand filtration as compared with the so called mechanical filtration is a natural gravity filtration method, slower in action and subject to certain limitations—that is, a greater area for purification is necessary—and it is not successful in clearing turbid river waters of the finely divided clay contents. It is, however, the second most widely used method in the United States and is in Europe proportionately more widely used.

Chemical purification, necessary with water of a certain character, accompanied by the introduction of carbonate of lime, etc., to soften the water and for the removal of iron and objectionable acids.

Biological processes, accomplished by oxidation of organic matter by its use as food for organisms, which assist its destruction, and by the death of the objectionable organisms as the result of unfavorable conditions artificially produced, such as the absence of food and presence of antagonistic organisms, the remains then being removed by the purification process.

Aeration by evaporation of gases held in solution, the cause of objectionable tastes and odors; evaporation of carbonic acid, a food supply for some kinds of growths, and the supplying of oxygen necessary for certain chemical purifications and especially necessary to support growths of water purifying organisms. Aeration is accomplished by exposing the water in thin sheets to the air, as in falling over dams or overflows, and by pumping it up into the air out of a pipe, as in the form of a low or bubbling geyser.

Aerial Illumination Has Been Undertaken With Unusual Success.

Details of a novel and spectacular kind of night attack by the Germans, the chief feature of which is an illumination of the whole zone of artillery fire by a vivid pyrotechnic display, have been brought into Warsaw by Russian soldiers from the Bzura front. This device is usually employed on cloudy nights, when the moon and stars cannot be depended on to reveal the positions of the Russian guns.

The Germans appear to be relying more and more upon this device for acquainting themselves with the disposition of the enemy's forces, since, on account of the protection given by Russian aviators, German aeroplanes have been unable to fly low enough to be of much service as scouts. Batteries only partly screened by clumps of trees or placed with little hope of effective concealment, behind rocks or in natural depressions in the ground apparently have been unnoticed by the aerial scouts, who found it advisable in most cases to keep to an altitude of 2,000 feet or higher.

The aerial illumination has been undertaken with great success. Coming at a moment of [illegible] it is intended to accomplish the double aim of revealing the Russian batteries and dazzling and distracting the enemy in their efforts to reply. First a great number of rockets are set off and break over the Russian line. While the sky is still glowing with this radiance larger and more powerful explosives follow the rockets, bursting into fiery balls of red and white, which hang for a moment motionless over the Russian positions. In this glare every gun and gunner, every detail of the landscape, shows up as clearly as in daylight. Some of the balls of fire fall upon clumps of trees, and to the brightness overhead is added the fire of burning wood.

In a few seconds the illumination fades, and the trenches and batteries are again in darkness, but in this time the German gunners have been able to get their range. After a verification of the enemy's positions by the use of powerful searchlights there follow the crackle of machine guns and the booming of the heavy artillery.

Appeal of Carnegie Steel Company to Its Workmen.

An appeal to its thousands of employees to lead moral lives as a means of increasing their own safety when at work and of improving their chances for promotion has been made by the Carnegie Steel company of Pittsburgh as a part of a "safety first" campaign.

In a series of pamphlets which have been distributed among the men for several weeks, the company, by means of charts, shows how much longer a man lives who lives "right" than one who dissipates, and tells of the better school work done by children of the workmen who [illegible] compared with one who does not, and how much less liable the workman is to accident because of his being more alert and careful. The men are appealed to strictly from a business standpoint.

Boy Scouts Growing.

The ratio of increase of the Boy Scouts of America is indicated by a striking paragraph from the chief scout executive's report: From Oct. 1, 191 to Feb. 5, 1915, 45,830 boys were enrolled, as compared with 32,929 for the same period of 1913 and 1914; 839 new troops were organized, as compared with 533 for the same period last year. Commissions were granted to 4,113 men to serve as scoutmasters and assistants as compared with 2,261 for the same period of last year.

SEA WANDERER WORLD OUTCAST

Nathan Cohen Completes First Year on Ocean.

HE'S AGAIN MENTALLY SOUND

Travels Thirty-four Thousand Miles on Forty-five Dollar Steerage Ticket. Ship's Company Taking Kindly to Him—About to Start on Another Trip of 7,000 Miles.

Nathan Cohen, who is thirty-five and unmarried and remembers little of his boyhood except that he spent most of it in Brazil, and who has the impression that he was born there and that Portuguese is his natural speech, arrived in New York harbor again by the Lamport & Holt liner Vasari, completing a year's experience afloat at the expense of the steamship line, with a record of 33,740 miles of sea travel.

In that year he has acquired a good knowledge of the English language and according to the ship's surgeon, Dr. Davis, has become mentally and physically sound again through the medium of sea air, frequently prescribed for rundown folk and regarded by veteran navigators as the greatest tonic on tap in the universe.

The case of Nathan Cohen is unique in the annals of deported immigrants. He came to New York by the Vasari in May, 1912, went to Virginia and set up a little store with a relative. He showed [illegible] two years later and was sent to Ellis island. There the experts decided that his mental crookedness was due to causes which had existed before he came to America, and he was ordered deported to Rio de Janeiro, the port whence he came.

Nathan was tractable. He accepted the decision of Uncle Sam without protest and was put aboard the Vandyck, since sunk by the German cruiser Karlsruhe, and in May of last year he sailed southward. Rio de Janeiro refused to accept him, as he had no papers to show that he was a citizen of Brazil, and so the Vandyck took him on to the final southern port of the line, Buenos Aires, 7,000 miles from Sandy Hook.

Back to New York Again.

The skipper tried Rio again on the way back, but the authorities were obdurate, and Nathan found himself in New York once more. But he had not then found himself mentally. In fact, he was hardly conscious whether he was afloat or ashore and was weak physically. He had traveled 19,740 miles on his original steerage ticket, for which he had paid $45, and had been well provided for, the ship's company taking kindly to him.

The line tried to persuade the immigration authorities that Nathan was all right when they took him aboard originally and again made an effort to have him sent to some place of permanent anchorage. There was a hint of Russian in the Portuguese of Nathan, and it was suggested that he might have been born in Russia.

While the authorities were considering sending him to Russia the war came and put an end to the plan. Then down to Rio Nathan went again. Rio refused again to regard him as a Brazilian citizen, and the ship took him on to Buenos Aires and brought him back.

Nathan says in pretty good English that he is all right. He has color and flesh and good humor, and the line is going to get alienists to pass on his condition so he may cease to be a sea Wandering Jew at its expense. Ellis Island cannot go back of its decision unless it is proved that Nathan is now sane and capable of earning his living.

Unless proof to satisfy the government is offered Nathan will start on another 7,000 mile trip and will come back over the same course some time within a few months unless a German cruiser interferes with the voyage of the Vasari.

Captain Cadogan of the Vasari, who was also skipper of the Vandyck when she carried Nathan, has acquired a gentle feeling for the man without a country and says he will feel sort of lonesome if Nathan is taken away from him. He looks upon him as a mascot, shooing off the German raider menace.

GIRLS JOIN ANTI-WAR CLUB.

Barnard Students Pledged to Frown Upon All Militarism.

One hundred Barnard girls have joined the Columbia Anti-Militaristic club, which, founded three months ago, has spread to all the big colleges. Princeton, Harvard, Pennsylvania, Trinity, New York university and others have organized clubs and are actively molding student opinion against war. In joining the society the Barnard girls signed the following platform:

"The phenomenon of war among civilized nations is the most shameful of all human spectacles, the most hideous of all national disasters. Its persistence is due not to inadequacy of military preparation, but to the perfection of military preparation.

"Holding these views, I set myself against the spread of militarism under any guise or color. I look upon every influence used by individuals to bring about the perfection of international order and to champion the cause of international solidarity as a true expression of the highest American patriotism."

BILLIONS OF GERMS AT GRATINGS OF SUBWAY.

Bacilli Shown as Ventilating System Is Urged For New Line.

Several billion disease germs collected at an opening of the present subway and stuck on plates were exhibited to the public service commission in New York city as a living argument for providing the new Broadway subway with an improved and sanitary ventilating system.

Members of the Broadway association, headed by Jesse I. Straus, poured into the commission's hearing room to protest against the plan to provide air for the underground road through sidewalk gratings, as in the present subway. Dr. North, a bacteriologist, submitted his collection of bacilli, which were captured near the gratings at Fourth avenue and Fourteenth street, as proof of the foulness that pours from the subway.

William R. Willcox reminded the commission that the gratings not only admit filth to the subway, but are also unpleasant for pedestrians on account of the polluted air that rises through them. Speaking of the dangers of using the same ventilating system for the new Broadway line, he said:

"The air so polluted would not only be projected into the faces and lungs of pedestrians, but would necessarily enter at the doors and windows of places of amusement or business."

George Hallett Clark, an engineer, said it would be feasible to expel the subway air mechanically through ornamental kiosks in public squares and park spaces. Mr. Straus said more than $50,000,000 worth of property between Thirty-second and Fortieth streets would be affected in value by sidewalk gratings.

Alfred Craven, chief engineer of the commission, told the petitioners that no definite plans for a better system than gratings had been presented and that anything of the sort would be seriously considered.

ELIHU ROOT

Philadelphia, March 26.—Elihu Root, of New York, ex-United States Senator from that State, was honored last night as the "first citizen of the Republic" by the most historic organization of this historic city, the Union League.

And this "first citizen of the Republic," as he was called by Senator Oliver, was not honored in that respect alone by the 1500 men who grasped his hand. He was hailed by those staunch Republicans, the leaders of their party, as the man, should he say the word, who above all others would carry the standard of that party to victory in 1916.

In response to this greeting, this signal honor, the man whom the leaders would make their leader in the pending fight, in a remarkable address inaugurated what he declared should grow into a national educatioaal campaign to stamp out sectional controversy, suspicion and distrust of business and the detrimental results of the policies of a hostile government, which knows nothing of business and discards the testimony of men who know and conduct business.

Tracing the history and struggles and victories of the Republican party from the time of Lincoln, this "first Republican, the leader of all Republicans," sounded a stern warning to the members of the Union League that again they must face the stress and storm of battle if they would see the Union perpetuated and individual independence preserved from the "designs of all business—a party that subjects men to suspicion and a policy which is responsible for the present hesitancy and unrest."

Members Honor Root.

The Union League has honored many men, Presidents, cabinet members, prospective presidents, statesmen of all ranks and types. But Tuesday night it conferred an unusual and a distinct honor upon Elihu Root, President John Gribbel, holding the gold medal of the Union League in his hand, told the ex-Senator that it was the pleasure of the members of the club to express their deep appreciation of his services to the nation by presenting it to him. And then, returning the members, he said the first Union League medal was given to Abraham Lincoln and the medal presented to Mr. Root was struck from the die from which the Lincoln medal was struck.

"Mr. Root," he said, "you will be the last man to receive a medal struck from that die, because we found, when this medal was removed, that the die was broken."

Mr. Root arrived in Philadelphia shortly before 6 o'clock Tuesday night. He was entertained at dinner by the president and directors of the Union League. Senator Oliver, of this State, and Senator Smott, of Utah, were guests at the dinner.

The reception was held in the assembly room of the club. A platform banked with palms and flowers and draped in flags was erected at the entrance. When the members were seated Mr. Gribbel led Mr. Root through the room to the platform. Senators Oliver and Smoot and John Wanamaker joined them.

Before presenting the medal to Mr. Root, Mr. Gribbel read a telegram from Governor Brumbaugh expressing regret at his absence. He then introduced Senators Oliver and Smoot.

Senator Oliver had designated Mr. Root the "first citizen of the Republic." Senator Smoot honored him with the title of "leader of the Republican party of the country." Many titles, ones of honor and deep respect, were applied to him.

"It is difficult for me to respond to your expressions of esteem," Mr. Root said. "All I can say is that those things which have been said in the last hour are very dear to me. I did not know of your intention to present the medal to me. I accept it with deep gratitude. No titles are conferred upon men in this country, but we pay in deep appreciation and gratitude every debt we think we owe to our public servants. No office and no title could be worth so much as your good judgment and your appreciation.

"As I came to this city Tuesday I reflected upon the past. My thoughts turned back to the days of President McKinley, and I remembered that McKinley was elected to his high office by the business men of this country. The men who placed him in that office were the men who carried on the great industries of this great nation.

Deplores Great Change

"How great has been the change. The distinctive characteristic of recent years has been the conduct of Government by men who have little concern in business and who distrust and suspect men of business. Measures relating to the conduct of great and small business have been framed and enacted by men who rejected the advice of business men.

"The testimony of railroad men on legislation affecting railroads has been rejected because they were parties of interest. The same is true of manufacturers, bankers, ship owners, merchants, men of all lines of trade. Knowledge of the business affairs of the country has disqualified men from taking part in the conduct of the Government and participation in the control of Government affairs.

"Now all this is not a matter of accident. It is a development of the feeling of unrest of the whole country. It is in some degree sectional, but is not generally so. Men in agricultural lines distrust men of business. That is one distinctive feature of this movement.

"This movement has gained strength because, in some degree, it is founded upon the old hatred of great wealth. But it must be remembered that a great deal of the hatred of wealth is fostered by a mere vulgar worship of wealth. But to the poor farmer it really seems as if the rich are living in heaven at his expense. Another cause of this change has been the failure to understand the processes, conditions and results of vast business enterprises by which wealth is created and maintained.

"We have become so complicated and involved that one community fails to understand the other; and so, by envy of wealth of the industrial communities and through general misunderstanding there has come about a feeling of adverse interest instead of that so necessary to the business of the country.

"Laws recently have been enacted. I do not want to criticise them, but everywhere, in every direction, suspicion of business is the characteristic of the day, and even now there is a desire for enlargement of the Government's responsibilities over business.

Laws Alone Not Responsible.

"These laws alone, however, are not responsible for the stagnation of the present time. The men who control our Government had been fighting the tariff, fighting the railroads, fighting the banks so long that when they came to the administration of the affairs of the Government they could not and cannot rid themselves of the inherent hostile attitude toward American enterprises. The underlying law of all their actions is hostility to business and the men whom they think get undue profits from business. And the real reason why business does not go forward is because away down in the hearts of all Americans there is a doubt of what will happen at the hands of this hostile Government.

"The election of a Republican President in 1915 will not be enough to curb this tendency. The people who are doing these things are honest Americans, but they do not understand the situation. This misunderstanding should be cleared away. Its continuance again would raise a doubt of the perpetuation of the Union. We cannot live with misunderstandings between sections of the nation. Business men should see that they are not misrepresented or misunderstood. They should get out of the condition of mind which they have been in; should assert themselves, and put forth a campaign of education and instruction, as that people of all sections of America can honor and respect each other as Americans. Get out of the condition in which one part of the nation feels no regret at the disasters of another section. Remember that regulation, inspection and so forth of business holds a danger, the danger that the power of regulating and controlling will be abused; and this the business men of the nation must prevent.

"I grieve to see men out of work. But this is nothing to the danger that the people may become subservient to power; and, therefore, it is the duty of the American people, of the Republican party and this great old club to work for the preservation of individual independence and the rights and integrity of the people."

Senator Smoot, introduced by Mr. Gribbel as the man who might write the next new tariff bill, declared that, should a new tariff bill be written in 1917, it would be a bill that would protect the American business man and the man who works with his hands. He paid high tribute to Mr. Root and declaimed against Democratic legislation, and particularly the trades commission bill.

Oliver Scores Congress

In his opinion, Senator Oliver said, the 63d Congress would be particularly applauded in history rather for what it failed to do than for what it really accomplished. When all the positive enactments of Congress are repealed or modified or forgotten, the 63d Congress will take a proud place in history as the one that refused to pass the shipping bill.

Another important feature of the recent Congress, Senator Oliver declared to be the curbing of Executive usurpation. He said that for several years the Executive branch of the Government had been encroaching upon the legislative branch; and particularly under this administration every important law passed emanated from the White House, and refusal to support the President's measures was to incur Executive displeasure. Should the shipping bill have been passed, Senator Oliver said, barriers to Executive usurpation would have been swept away and Congress would have degenerated into a mere registering device to carry out the presidential will.

Senator Oliver paid a glowing tribute to Mr. Root for his stand against passage of the bill, especially because of his action in forcing the measure to a debate.

Describing the keynote to his mental make-up as "clarity," and his other leading attributes as political sagacity and absolute sincerity, Senator Oliver said Mr. Root was a man who followed only the dictates of his conscience, who stood firm for right, whether it be popular or unpopular.

"My friends," he said, "when I contemplate the character of this great American and the need of our country for such a man, I am filled with regret that we cannot stay the hand of time as Joshua of old bade the sun and moon to stand still in their courses; for if he were 10 years younger, or even today if he would say the word, in spite of the burden of his three-score years and 10 there would be little controversy about who should carry the Republican standard to victory."

LONDON PAPER URGES PEACE ON "MAIN ISSUES"

London, March 27.—The leading editorial in the Economist, published this morning, says:

"As soon as the main issues for which we are fighting can be achieved it is just as much the duty of our statesmen to make peace as it was, in view of Sir Edward Grey, to make war at the end of July last. The time may come before long when it will be possible to consult the dictates of humanity and at the same time secure the objects indicated by Sir Edward Grey. If such an opportunity is lost the war will not go on forever. It will end in revolutionary chaos, beginning no one can say where and ending in no one can say what."

Sale of Ship's Cargo Will Be Pressed

London, March 27.—The end of the Wilhelmina case was forecasted yesterday when Mr. Greenwood, Solicitor of the Treasury, notified the owners of the cargo that it was proposed to discharge the cargo and apply for an order for the sale of any of the cargo which appears to be deteriorating. This indicates that the case will be definitely disposed of, as far as the possibility of the cargo reaching Germany is concerned.

Mr. Walter Hines Page, the American Ambassador, and Mr. Robert P. Skinner, Consul General, are supporting the protest by Mr. Arthur G. Hayes, attorney for the cargo owners, but there is slight chance of a trial before the cargo is sold.

APPLE RED BUGS NOW WORKING

Cornell Warns Against the Insects, Giving Methods of Controlling Them

Because of the approach of spring and the consequent need that fruit-growers take precautions against injurious insects which attack their crops, the state college of agriculture at Cornell is issuing a number of publications about these insects and methods for their control.

Among those insects which cause great injury to apples are two kinds of redbugs. Observations of these bugs and studies of adequate methods of controlling them have been going on in different parts of the State, under the direction of the Cornell experiment station, for nearly ten years. A bulletin describing the insects in considerable detail and giving directions for its control was published in January, 1911, and has recently been revised and reprinted.

It is sometimes well, says the bulletin, for a man to know at an early date whether or not his apples are likely to be injured by redbugs. He may ascertain this by bringing into the house, any time after the first of March, twigs from bearing branches, and allowing the buds to open. If redbug eggs are present they will hatch soon after the leaves appear, and reddish dots, caused by the feeding punctures of the insects, will be seen on the leaves.

In the orchard the eggs of one species hatch while the blossoms are opening; those of the other species hatch about a week later. The insects begin feeding immediately on the opening leaves. They attack the fruit when it is very small. Some of the punctured apples mature, but they are not marketable.

The apple redbugs, being sucking insects, can be controlled only by contact sprays. Whale-oil soap and kerosene emulsion have been tried without success. Nicotine preparations, on the other hand, have given excellent results. The first spraying should be done just before the blossoms open, when the nymphs are small and easily killed.

The publication which treats of this subject is bulletin 291 of the Cornell University agricultural experiment station, and is entitled The Apple Redbugs. It will be sent free on request to residents of New York State.

Two Tax Board Members Deny They Were "Ordered" to Increase Assessments Upon City Business Properties

No Undue Influence Brought to Bear Upon the Board, Is Substance of Statements

Flat denials have been made by Mayor Fox, city Attorney Fanning and Assessors W. H. Merriam and Daniel Brennan to statements contained in The Evening Times, to the effect that the two first-named city officials had ordered the Board of Assessors to make an increase of 25 per cent. upon all city business property.

As matters stand now the average citizen is apt to become quite dazed at the denials and assertions and assertions and denials.

The raz-e-daz in the meantime goes merrily on in places where men do congregate, and men are asking—If that order was not issued—Why did Mr. Hulett resgn?

In rebuttal of The Evening Times' story of the resignation of Mr. Hulett, published March 26, Assessors Merriam and Brennan furnish over their signatures the following:

MR. MERRIAM SAYS MAYOR DID NOT OVERSTEP BOUNDARIES

In the Syracuse Journal of March 25th and in the Fulton Times of March 26, 1915, appeared certain articles to the effect that the "Mayor and City Attorney" had ordered the Assessors to increase the Assessors any discretionary power in the matter, and that the

The Journal article further stated that the "Order" did not give the Assessors any discrestionary power in the matter, and that the 25 per cent, increase was to apply on all business property regardless of whether the same was fairly assessed now or not.

The statement in the Journal is absolutely false in so far as it states that the Mayor and City Attorney ordered any increase. I have not personally seen the City Attorney to speak with, or spoken with him in three months or more.

The Board of Assessors did meet with the Mayor previous to the beginning of this assessing. The Board appreciates the fact that the Mayor, under the charter, is charged with the supervision of, and that it is his duty to examine and supervise the work of city officials, and that in his position as Mayor he was perfectly justified and within his rights in consulting with the Board of Assessors and stating his position as to their actions and duties. There was no order given such as spoken of and no mandatory requirement made that the assessors do any other thing than to exercise their own judgment and discretion in the assessing of the city property. The amount as to which property should be assessed was discussed between the Mayor and the Assessors. The position taken by the Mayor was that it was necessary to raise the assessments on some of the property in the city, and that as far as he could see the class of property—that is property from which an income is derived. He stated his position as to what he thought should be done and no objection was made to it by any of the assessors.

Upon leaving the Mayor with the other assessors I considered I had the same discretionary powers as ever, and that I was able to use my own judgment as to the value of property and the figures at which it should be assessed. Personally I do not consider that the Mayor over-reached his perogative, as stated in the Fulton Times, but that the meeting of the assessors was simply one for the purpose of getting the idea of the Mayor as to what he thought should be done.

I am making this statement to correct the impression that the Assessors have in any way been interfered with or co-erced in making the assessments.

W. H. MERRIAM.

Fulton, N. Y., March 27, 1915.

MR. BRENNAN SAYS MAYOR SUGGESTED EQUALIZING RATES

I have read the statement issued by Mr. Merriam, one of my associates on the Board of Assessors, and wish to say that the same is in all particulars true.

That at the meeting between the Mayor and the Board of Assessors there was no order or demand made upon the assessors that any business property or any other property should be raised 25 per cent. The questions discussed between the Assessors and the Mayor was simply their opinion as to the value of the different properties. The Mayor stated his position to be that he believed that the business section of the city, that is the section comprising the business places and which is a source of income to the owners, was as a class assessed at a lower rate according to its true value than other property in the city, and that to equalize the assessments it should be raised.

As one of the assessors I considered it proper for the Mayor to confer with the assessors, and proper for him to state his position in the matter. At the same time I did not consider that it was binding upon the assessors but that the Board should use its own judgment and discretion in the matter and make the assessments as they saw fit, which has been done.

The work of the local Board of Assessors is in a measure up for inspection, and has been since Saturday, when State officials arrived here to inspect, and advise in connection with assessments.

A STORY WITH A MORAL

A well-known physician not far from Fulton recently received a personal letter from a large mail order house in the West. It was a well written appeal and closed by saying:

"If there is any reason why you do not buy of us, please give your reason in the enclosed stamped envelope and we will strive to remove the cause."

"Your letter of recent date ... y I had not traded with you for a long time reserved, ... as you ask me to tell you frankly why, I will give you a few reasons:

"First. I am in business in this community, and am looking to this community, with its varied industries, for my support. I cannot ask the merchants of this town for their support if I do not give them mine.

"Second. In looking over my books, I fail to find the names of any members of your company, which reminds me that none of your officials have exer given me a penny's patronage. Why is this? Am I too far away or have none of you needed a physician, or are they afraid of the mail order plan when it comes to the practice of medicine? I can certainly give as good satisfaction by mail as your house can and will appreciate a call from any members of your company when in need of medical services.

"Third. In looking over the subscription lists for improving our streets and public highways, I have failed to find the names of any members of your company down for one penny to assist in the work. Also I have failed to find your names on any of the charity lists where help has rendered to our poor. In other words you are not down as a contributor to our Helping Hand Society. In fact, in all the movements for the betterment of our conditions, where our community has needed the united efforts of her public-spirited citizens, I have failed to find your names among the list of our contributing merchants. Your name is not on our [illegible] and I find where you have [illegible] with our home merchants.

"These are a few answers to your questions and I trust you will see the justice of them."

RUSSIANS HOLD 600,000 AUSTRO-TEUTON CAPTIVES

London, March 29.—The Daily Telegraph's correspondent wires from Petrograd:

"Russia pushes forward steadily in the Carpathians without suffering serious check in any of the passages through the hills.

"It is obvious from the number of captives made during the last fortnight that the Austrian army is rapidly wearing away. The process is now one of disintergration rather than of attrition. During the fortnight the capture of Austrians, apart from the huge coup at Permysl, must have averaged at least 3,000 daily.

"According to authoritative information the Russians already have 600,000 Austrians in their hands, and the total losses of the army of the dual monarchy since the outbreak of the war cannot have been much less than fifty per cent. of its strength."

The Times' Petrograd correspondent says the Austrian reinforcements arrived too late to prevent the Russians from gaining command of the roads into Hungary.

The correspondent adds that the German Field Marshal, von Hindeberg, apparently has disposed of the Eighth, Ninth and Tenth armies in a manner calculated to enable him to retain the defensive until larger forces or favorable circumstances warrant a resumption of the offensive.

ALLIES TOILED TO ALLIGN ITALY FOR WAR

London March 29.—Sunday was devoted to the labors of the diplomatists of the allied nations in an effort to bring about a reorganization of the Balkan League and to insure the alignment of Italy and the Balkan States with the Allies.

Rome dispatches indicate that the war fever is at its height and that the government is listening with earnest purpose to the eage cry for immediate participation in the conflict. Great demonstratoins were held and orators of fame and skill urged their hearers to demand that the government take action to fulfil the ambitions of the country.

Troops were moving in all parts of the country and, most significant of all, the Alpine warriors of the first line were called to the colors for forty-five days. In addition all artillery and engineer officers were called for a service of [illegible]ty days from April 16.

Serbia, it was indicated, is on the point of making concessions to Bulgaria in that part of Macedonia which fell to her share after the Balkan war, while Germans agents in Sofia were busily endeavoring to induce Bulgaria to remain neutral, holding out as a reward the cession of part of European Turkey.

Dispatches from Bucharest stat that the British minister has protested against the passage through Roumania by rail of ammunition and other war material for Turkey. The ransmission of these war munitions by way of Bulgaria previously had been stopped. In reply to the British Minister's protest, the reports say, Roumania explained that the material had escaped the notice of the officials on the frontier, and in order to prevent a repetition of the incident all cars hereafter would be inspected by the frontier guards.

Turkish Government Tells People Allies Will Leave Straits

Population Urged to Remain Calm; That Fleet Is Making a Simple Demonstration and After Three or Four Days Will Steam Away

London, March 29.—"Constantinople is calm, expectant and resigned to the inevitable. The government is preparing the inhabitants for the arrival of the allied fleet. I am told promclamations are posted in Pera and in the mosques of Stamboul announcing that war ships of France and England soon may arrive in the Bosphorus. The proclamation continues to say it simply is a question of opening up the Dardanelles and the Bosphorus to free passage of foreign war ships, which the Sulton hitherto has refused and has no national or political significance.

"The population is urged to remain calm and not resort to any acts of violence and we are assured that after a stay of three or four weeks the allied fleet will steam away, being content with a simple naval demonstration. I am informed the proclamation reads:

A dispatch to the Exchange Telegraph last night from Bucharest says:

"Field Marshal von der Goltz, of the German army, arrived here this afternoon on his way to Berlin. He informed the Bucharest representative of the Berliner Tageblatt that he would return to Constantinople in the near future.

"The Turkish army, von der Goltz said, was in excellent spirits and had plenty of ammunition. The Turks, he added, were eager to oppose the Allies on land and were confidenet of success.

"Operations have been recommended in the Dardanelles by the allied fleets and heavy firing is proceeding in the straits following [illegible] A big gun [illegible] both [illegible] over the Gallipoli peninsula and from a station a mile outside the entrance to the straits, was continued on Sunday with short intervals from ten o'clock in the morning until half-past three o'clock in the afternoon.

"From Mount Elias, the highest point here, I saw shells bursting on the hills near Chanak and Kilid Bahr. For half an hour the fire was at the rate of two shells a minute. The enemy didn't reply."

"X" Mark Before Name Indicates Choice of Your Candidate

Some misunderstanding seems to exist concerning the method of voting now being employed by the Chamber of Commerce in its election of directors. To remove any such misunderstanding, this method is outlined as follows:

On Saturday ballots were mailed to each of the members. These ballots contained the names of the 34 directors who were nominated in the primary election which occurred last week.

Each member may vote for ANY nine of these candidates by putting "X" marks in front of the nine names of his choice. The voter is under no obligation to consider the order of arrangement of names on the ballot, in making his selection.

The nine men on this ballot receiving the highest votes become the directors of the organization. The three highest are elected for three years; the next three highest for two years; the next three highest for one. Thereafter three directors are elected each year. This arrangement insures practically continuous management to the organization.

The president, vice-president, treasurer and secretary will be elected by the board of directors. The president and vice-president must be elected from among the directors. The treasurer may be one of the directors or not, as the directors decide. The secretary may be added to the board of directors or not, as the directors decide. Inasmuch as the secretary has all ready been selected with much care by the committee of the old organization appointed for that purpose, their selection will simply be placed before the new board of directors for confirmation.

Opinions

Alcoholized "Medicines"

Alabama recently passed a law,over the veto of the Governor, forbidding the sale of any newspaper containing an advertisement of whiskey, wine or beer. Many "dry" states have stringent regulations against the distribution or possession of liquors, affecting even the tesmporary visitor. It has not yet occurred to them, however, to ban the sale of alcoholized medicines or the advertising of these compounds. "Why worry about prohibition?" the query of a federal official who had just inspected the patent medicine exhibits in the Bureau of Chemistry of the Department of Agriculture, has, therefore, some point. He had learned the Paine's Celery Compound contained 20 per cent alcohol; Wine of Cardui, 20 per cent alcohol; Peruna, 18 per cent; Lydia Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, 18 per cent; Electric Brand Bitters, 18 per cent—all "medicines" for internal use. He knew, also, what physicians and many laymen know, that some of these "remedies" acquire a hold on their users entirely comparable to the liquor habit.

Beer contains about 5 per cent alcohol. Most wines are about one-fifth alcohol—many less than that proportion. For "dry" states to ban beer and wines, therefore, while permitting the widest sale of compounds containing as much or more alcohol, in the name of curative sciencec, is farcical, if not hyporitical. If alcohol is so bad that anti-saloon organizations and state governments have to crusade against it, they should be logical enough to stop its sale whether it be an element of a "cure" or of wine.—Tribune, N. Y.

Protect the Workers!

The Court of Appeals decision unholding the law prohibiting night work in factories for women ought to have some deterrent effect on the legislators who are actively trying to scuttle the labor laws by amendments permitting unlimited working hours in canneries and a twelve hour factory day for women workers. That nalp was part of a comprehensife scheme of legislation enacted as a result of the Factory Investigation Commission's report. It is a companion to the fifty-four hour a week law, the law limiting working hours in canneries and similar measures, and was founded on exactly the same idea of conserfing the health of factory employes for their own personal benefit and that of the community at large.

To break down the labor law now in any part is to abandon a proper and legal policy whereby the state undertakes to safeguard its workers, its greatest asset. That wise policy, humane and economically sound, was not the result of emotional haste, but of careful study and mature consideration. Experience under the broadened modern labor law goes to show that it is quite possible for business concerns to live up to its requirements for most of them do it. Protest against it come from a minority of those affected, as is notably the case with the caneries. Whether these protests arise from special conditions, as some insist, or from unusual greed, as easily may be the case the facct remains that in the end the workers would pay if the law were weakened. New York State cannot acord to abandon its policy of protecting them.—Tribune, N. Y.

MINETTO MAN LOSES FOUR FINGERS OF HAND

Mr. Havens operated a slat machine and got his hand caught in the machine. Before he could extricate the hand the four fingers had been badly lacerated. Foreman Fred Stickney gave first aid to the injured man and called Dr. Wallace, who dressed the injury. Mr. Havens was taken to the Oswego Hospital, where Dr. A. W. Irwin, assisted by Dr. Wallace, amputated the four fingers. Mr. Havens is one of the older employesof the company, having worked at the plant for twenty years. He lives in Minetto.

To the second oldest pioneer we will send the paper for three years free, and to the third, one year free.

ECONOMY WHERE NEEDED

There is no question that there is waste in every department of this city's government; the same fact obtains, with few exceptions, in every city in the land. There is no question that many improvements have been needed in the past; that there remain needed improvments is obvious to the most dyed-in-the-wool city patriot; but that in conducting the improvements it cannot be charged against us that good business practice has been observed. It would be unfair to charge against the officials of the city that they have departed from the straight and narrow path of honesty, but it is altogether appropriate to lay up against the citizenship in general a charge of carelessness and lack of co-operation.

When the present administration came into office it faced a deficit. The city's bonded indebtedness had reached an enormous figure—a condition brought about more or less by the bunching together of the conduct of public works. In the course of a comparatively short space of time enormous improvements were made to schools, streets, etc., and as a consequence it became apparent to good business men that nothing short of real business practices and tactics would or could bring about a better financial standing of the city.

One fixed rule in business practice is to economize at the right time—at the very time when times are hard or when there is a limited demand for manufactured articles. It is then that the careful man looks after the expenses of his establishment; that he decides to not invest a dollar in anything for the improvement of his plant that is not made imperative by existing conditions. It at such times that a careful man of business shows whether he has command of the situation—that he is master and manager.

The question as to whether improvements and public works in the city of Fulton were administered wisely is another side of the question, one that must be left to the judgment of the taxpayers, whose duty it surely was to see that their representatives conducted business upon business principles. It must be conceded that the improvements were needed, and that still more are needed, yet business sense tells the average citizen that the time has come when there should be a halter made tight about the neck of the horse that was driven in 1914.

The old horse has been ridden at a lively clip in this city. In order to keep up the pace he must be fed at the same rate as in the past. In other words, if we are to continue the work of making public improvements at the same rate as in the past, a bigger quantity of oats must be given the beast; and to provide the necessary amount of food there must come a higher valuation of taxable property, for it is a fact conceded by everybody that the city's tax rate is now far in excess of that which is dictated by good business ethics.

Improvement in methods must come from somewhere. The business of running a city the size of Fulton is a big business. It is not a child's play, yet it is apparent that the taxpayers themselves are guilty in certain respects of playing like children in the matter of not looking after their interests. The taxpayers' money has been spent in making improvements—worthy improvements. We have an expensive water department, and streets and bridges that would look well if they were kept clean. Our water department boasts of the bountifulness of the supply, but in spite of the claim, our busiest business streets are allowed to remain in a condition that does not speak well for the ample supply of water. As to whether the taxpayers are getting value for money expended is a matter of ethics. There is, however, one point upon which all must unite, and that point is, that in the year 1915 the city of Fulton has no moral right to expend a dollar for new improvements. The city has a legal and civil right to maintain its present public works and that is all. It has a right to observe a policy of retrenchment, because good business sense so dictates; and if "what is everybody's business continues to be nobody's business," then there should soon, very soon, come a day of reckoning when everybody will make it his business to select for this city a head that can and will make it his business to secure for the taxpayers dollar value for a dollar spent; and, who can and will make it his business to observe the first and last words in good business practice—to practice real economy when real economy is demanded.

REHABILITATING CIVIL SERVICE

Senator Horton's Bill Disclaimed As Anything But Ripper Legislation

Albany, March 29.—Senator Horton, chairman of the committee on civil service has introduced a bill which, if enacted, will put a stop to competitive class employes appointed without examination and who have not served the time required by law to warrant such transfer.

In th eclosing months of the last administration wholesale transfers of this character were made and so gross had been the disregard of the basis law of the state that Governor Whitman called attention to it in his message to the Legislature and recommended such legislation "as will compel obedience to the very simple mandate of the constitution that appointments and promotion may be made according to merit and fitness, to be ascertained, so far as practicable, by examination.

Some of the Democratic members of the Legislature and some of the Democratic newspapers attack the Horton bill as ripper legislation because of its provision that every person holding an office or position covered in the competitive class by action of the state civil service commission or any municipal commission since November 1, 1914, shall cease to hold his office and the same shall became vacant three months after this law takes effect," unless he shall have held the office for three years."

The opponents of the bill profess to see in this requirement for three years' service discrimination against Democrats and yet in that particular the bill follows exactly the present requirement of the civil service law that an employe appointed to the exempt class shall have served faithfully for three years before he is entitled to transfer to the competitive class as is very clearly shown by the following quotation from section fourteen of the civil service law as it has stood on the statute books for the past sixteen years: "No person shall be appointed or employed under any title not appropriate to the duties to be performed, and no person shall be transferred to, or assigned to perform the duties of any position subject to competitive examination, unless he shall have passed an open competitive examination equivalent to that required for such position, or unless he shall have served with fidelity for at least three years in a similar position."

THE WORTH OF A SMILE

By I. E. Hyde

Don't knock at a knocker, my brother,
Instead, pass him by with a smile.
Show, malice, your meaning to smother
And meet him half way with a smile,
And when he sees you are smiling,
His features will photo a grin.
Just make yourself so beguiling,
Your neighbor will balk at his sin.
For there's bad in the best of us, neighbor,
So, brother, don't flay and belabor
The man it's your duty to woo.
You know, gems oft' need a re-setting;
And mankind they say is a gem.
And God would not have us forgetting
Our duty of uplifting them.
All eyes are not always far-seeing;
All ears are not tuned to sweet sounds;
All tongues don't speak softly to being;
All feet don't travel smooth grounds.
The things you and I are contending
Are naught that the other man knows.
So smile, for a smile is but lending
To lighten the other chap's woes.
Don't knock at the knockers, my brothers;
Instead, pass them by with a smile.
For when you learn all that it smothers,
You'll find it has been worth your while.

So smile a while, and while you smile, another smile;
And life's worth while,

POLITICAL COMMENT

The New World says: "If Tammany had behaved itself in Albany, it would still be in control of the State." If Tammany behaved itself it would not be Tammany. And it will be remembered that the World worked hard to put Tammany in control in Albany in 1910 and to keep it there in 1912 and 1914.—Binghamton Republican.

* * *

The taxpayers of the State do not want a niggardly policy in the management of public affairs, but they do want the business of the commonwealth honestly and conscientiously administered. That is what the Republicans in authority are seriously endeavoring to do to the satisfaction of the people and the credit of the party in power.—Gloversville, Leader-Republican.

* * *

A direct tax is not a question of like or dislike. There is no reason for consulting constitufionists on a point about which there is no disagreement—anmely, the imposition of a direct tax. The only course either necessary or possible is to determine whether it will be feasible for the state, after all legitimate cuts have been made and appropriations pared to the greatest possible extent, to discharge its legitimate obligations without recourse to a direct tax. If this cannot be done, a direct tax becomes imperative—a painfully necessity following a four-year period of running amuck.—Auburn Advertiser-Journal.

* * *

The Republican party in the nation is watching to see what the Republican administration and legislature of New York will do. If it carries out its pledges it will rebound to the credit of the Republican party all over the nation, if it fails it will put a stain upon Republicanism all over the nation. It isn't going to fail, as events ever since the inauguration of Governor Whitman demonstrate. High and lofty ideals are to be carried out. As Governor Whitman says, real action is to follow promises and real action is following promises.—Watertown Times.

* * *

* * *

When in the national convention at Baltimore the Democratic party denounced the "waste of the money wrung from the people by oppressive taxation through the lavish appropriations of recent Republican Congresses which have kept taxes high and reduced the purchasing power of the people's toil." It sought the votes of the people, but since it got into power not one step has been taken by it to cut down those appropriations and now that Congress has adjourned and the facts are out, it is found that the most recent Republican Congresses are pikers compared to the one which has just finished its appropriations. The expenditures, if the Washington papers' figures count; and they are usually accurate, will run over $2,244,000,000 easily, an excess of one hundred and twenty-five millions over the Sixty-second Congress.—Olean Times.

* * *

Thus, the two billion dollar Congress is at last with us and in the face of lessened revenues and depression due to either war conditions or tariff, there was no corresponding disposition among the Democratic majority to make a cut in appropriations Mr. Gillett blames the President himself for conditions but almost everyone will agree that the administration as a whole has been recreant in its promises to lessen the estimates to meet a decreasing revenue.—Lockport Journal.

Scene from Luken's Indoor Circus—The Quirk Tonight

A Mysterious Disappearance

By MARJORIE CLOUGH

There was anxiety in the Maryweather family. Susan, the eldest daughter, aged eighteen, was missing. She had gone out during an afternoon, telling her mother that she would go to the library and do some shopping. She had not returned to supper, and her mother was very much worried about her. Mrs. Maryweather telephoned to various friends of Susie's, asking if she was with them, and received negative replies.

The next day an investigation was made as to where the girl had been during the previous afternoon. She had been to the library, where she had taken out a book, the name of which the librarian did not remember. She had not been at any store. The police were notified of the disappearance; inquiries were made at police stations in neighboring towns, but without eliciting any information.

Mellington, where the Maryweathers lived, was on the bank of a river. On the third day after Susie's disappearance, at a point on the river four miles above the town, where a boat was kept for ferriage, a book was found on the shore bearing the stamp of the Mellington library. It was returned to the library by a boy, who told how he had happened to find it and where. The librarian reported the matter to Mr. Maryweather, giving it as his opinion that it was the book his daughter had taken out of the library.

Beyond tracing Susie to this point on the river the find availed nothing, for there was no other clew by which she could be traced further.

Meanwhile every person who heard of the disappearance formed a theory concerning it. The greatest number believed that Susie had been kidnaped, but when a week had passed and no application for ransom had been received many doubted this explanation. Those who adhered to it were of opinion that the kidnapers had found it necessary to their safety to kill their victim. Another theory was that Susie had drowned herself under an attack of temporary insanity. No such mental ailing had appeared in the Maryweather family, and Susie had always been considered healthy in every respect. The only symptom that had been noticed was an apparent preoccupation.

Ten days passed and no clew to the disappearance, other than the book, was found. Then a man fishing in a boat near the middle of the river ten miles below Mellington caught his hook in something that he pulled to the surface and found it to be a plaid dress. The body of a woman was taken out of the water that had evidently been there a long while. It was very much swollen, and the features were unrecognizable. The hair—the only feature unchanged—was of the most ordinary color.

A portion of the dress was sent to Mrs. Maryweather, who at once identified it as one belonging to her daughter or had belonged to her. The mother was positive that Susie had not worn it the day she left home nor for a long while previous. She overhauled her daughter's old clothes, but did not find the dress indicated.

The police formed a theory that Susan Maryweather had gone away for some reason not known to her parents; and previous to her departure sent or taken certain clothing, by wearing which her identity could the better be concealed. While wearing the plaid dress she had committed suicide by drowning. This was a reasonable theory and disposed of the case, so that the police would not need to trouble themselves further about it.

Mr. Maryweather believed that the body found was that of his daughter; but, not wishing to destroy all hope in his wife, he did not press his opinion upon her. She took the ground that the theory of the police was absurd, but she was unable to account for the dress of the same pattern as one her daughter had owned being on the body found in the river. The only hope she had was that some other woman had worn a dress made of material of a similar pattern.

No claimant for the body appearing, Mr. Maryweather disposed of it without revealing what he had done with it. It was not treated as the body of his daughter—that is, no funeral was held since there was no certainty as to its identity.

The day after it had been put away a carriage drove up before the Maryweather home, and who should step out but Susie! She ran into the house, flung herself into the arms of her parents and announced that she had been married. Her husband was without, awaiting the result of her confession. Neither he nor she knew that she was supposed to be dead.

Susie's affair had been kept a secret because her lover's parents opposed his marriage. The day of her disappearance he had met her and persuaded her to go away with him and be married. They had crossed the ferry, and Susie had accidentally dropped the book there. As soon as their marriage had been confessed to the groom's parents and they had been forgiven they returned to Susie's home.

It turned out that Susie had long before given away the plaid dress, and it had found its way to a town some miles up the river and fallen into the hands of a girl who had committed suicide. The body had floated down with the current past Mellington before being recovered.

TOWN BOOSTING.

Mark Twain once remarked that a man would rather brag about his own town when he is away from home than brag about any other subject whatsoever, including his own wife. This is because a wife makes herself largely. But a town is made by its own citizens and by no one else.

WAR ON THE BILLBOARD.

From its very institution the American Civic association has devoted itself to the protection of the public against three great nuisances—smoke, poles and wires and billboards. At the recent annual convention of the association in Washington one of the important subjects discussed was billboards, with a principal address entitled "The Passing of the Signboard," by Jesse Lee Bennett of Baltimore, in which he recounted the steps that had been taken for the legal control of the billboard in all parts of the United States.

Concerning the sentiment against the billboard Mr. Bennett said: "The feeling against the signboard has become nation wide, and in the past few years the agitation of civic organizations has been so successful as to awaken resentment against it so widespread that from coast to coast and in almost every state and city there are now, or have been, vigorous movements seeking the abolition or regulation of these unnecessary and disfiguring objects.

"There has been much agitation, and from it there has been distilled one thing—the recognition of the fact that what is called the signboard problem is a question more complex than the mere removal of the signs. The signboard has been found to be inextricably intertwined with two questions of even greater importance—the awakening of civic sentiment and the recognition by legislators and judges of the validity of arguments based upon aesthetic considerations."

Commenting on what ought to be the attitude of the law and the courts toward the billboard, he added:

"It would take our psychologists but a few minutes to show that it is not a question of ear or nose or eye, but a question of the brain and of the very consciousness that is life itself. No law should permit any man to intrude or force himself or his business into another man's consciousness to the extent that outdoor advertising has come to permit, an intrusion immeasurably increased by the fact that it is impossible to avoid seeing signboards."

STEEL PRICES HIGHER

Dun's Review Predicts Early Building Activity. Prices Going Up

New York, March 27.—Domestic distribution of merchandise increases so slowly that the gains from week to week do not appear important and longer periods must be taken for comparsion in order to appreciate the progress made, though, of course, total transactions are still below producing capacity. Considerable activity has been promoted in pig iron this week at the expense of values. Finished steel output now averages a 75 per cent, rate of production, foreign orders being especially conspicuous. Copper is quiet, but strong on the outlook for increased consumption. The shipyards and the automobile industry are active. The demand for textiles is broadening, although the trade is still hampered by the scarcity of dyes and the higer price of the raw product. The fine weather and the indications of an early spring are favorable for retail trade. Silks and embroaderies show improvement. The shoe trade is quiet though steadf, with factories generally running on part time. The cotton market advances in activity and price. Wheat fluctuates according to the war news. In contrast to the conservative movement in domestic lines, is the remarkably rapid expansion in foreign trade, war orders overcoming the obstacles of limited shipping facilities, high freights and blockade risks. During February the exports of breadstuffs, oils, cotton and other products made extraordinary gains as compared with a year ago. Foreign orders are a feature of both the steel and the cotton goods markets. Exports of woolen goods have also been heavy. In other lines export orders are the sustaining influence. Never in the history of the world has there been so extraordinary a change in monetary conditions as has taken place in the United States between August and Marcch; the enormous balance of trade in favor of this country and the unprecedentedly low rates of exchange vividly illustrate the great gain in financial power. Exports in February were the largest on record, and the reducction in imports resulted in a balance for this country of over $450,000,000 in three months. Taken in connection with the cessation of American travel in Europe, and the probable transfer of considerable European capital to the United Sthates, this has caused a decline in exchange such as has not been mitnessed before in half a century. Negotiations are reported as pending for foreign credits in New York. Moreover, no such foreign liquidation of American securities has occurred as might have been expected, and the New York stock market is notably active and strong. There has been no development of the war that as yet definitely foreshadows progress towards peace, and the situation is still critical, with many delicate problems for neutral nations. Though money is plentiful for some purposes, and gold is being imported in large amounts, investment capital is conservative, especially as regards new projects. Collections generally are backward, but failures are slightly less numerous than in preceding months.

Notwithstanding the limited railroad, buying, active capacity with the steel interests has further increased, especially at many of the larger plants. The demand from various domestic sources is augmented by additional foreign orders, a considerable quantity of war and other material being manufactured here. Shipments abroad embrace a variety of products including rails, plates, tin plates, barb wire and wire rods. Weather conditions continue to favor outdoor work and prospects in structural lines are brighter, although only 30 per cent. of capacity was contracted for last month and new business is now needed. The movement of crude steel is much heavier than a month ago and the market is moderately strong.

Its Object to Bring State Government Up to Standards Set by People

Albany, March 28.—In issuing the call for delegates to a Constitutional Convention to meet in the Assembly Chamber at the Capitol on April 6th at noon, Francis M. Hugo, Secretary of State, who is to preside over the preliminary organization until a permanent officer is chosen, pointed out that this gathering will be the seventh to come together at the command of the sovereign people of the state for the special consideration of the organic law.

"The Convention," said Mr. Hugo, "is to review and seek better to adapt to the demands of our time the work of its predecessors, whose names gild the pages of our history, and to all of whose combined wisdom and patriotism, the inhabitants of the state are indebted for the priceless heritage they enjoy. In this way only will the ideals of popular government be realized and it will be the exalted privilege of the delegates to initiate the movement of bringing the government of this state up to its full standards.

"To remould the organic law of the leading commonwealth of the Union, however, is a task challenging the best efforts and the highest wisdom and in the progress of the march to that destination in which this state is unmistakably leading, the duty is likewise laid upon the approaching convention to maintain the supremacy of the Empire State, whose citizenship should be the highest boast of its inhabitants.

"But whatever may be ethe results accomplished in this convention, whether the amendments proposed be accepted or rejected by the people in whole or in part, thef cannot materially affect the good influence to be gained from such periodic conferences. The act of calling such a convention and of electing delegates with unlimited powers, constitutes a great political movement, in which the people of the state in a silent and peaceful manner, resume for a time their delegated powers, and claim the privilege of revising through their representatives the Constitution which forms the basis of their government and the guarantee of their rights and liberties."

YESTERDAY IN CHURCH CIRCLES

Local Churches by Special Music and by Text Observe the Day

At the First Methodist church yesterday, the Rev. George Stockwell took as his subject, "Building a City," and he compared the activities of the local Chamber of Commerce in its recent campaign to the work of the patriah, Nehemiah, who rebuilt Jerusalem. The speaker lauded the work of the citizens and the committee in the recent campaign and said that he hoped to see Fulton a better city in many ways when the chamber had been active for a short time.

It was announced that on Thursday evening a service would be held at the church for the Women's Home Missionary Society, in commemoration of the death of Christ on Good Friday.

STATE STREET CHURCH

"The Triumphant Morn" was the theme of the Rev. H. D. Holmes at the State Street M. E. church yesterday. Mr. Holmes drew a vivid picture of Christ's triumphant entry into Jersalem on the first Palm Sunday. Mrs. Fred Dolbear sang "The Palms" and the choir rendered the anthem, "Hosanna in the Highest."

At the evening service a special orchestra played the "The Palms" and Mr. Holmes spoke on "Lessons from the Fig Tree."

The Brotherhood class of the church met after the morning service and there was a meeting of the Epworth League in the afternoon.

Services will be held every evening during Holy Week beginning at 7.30 o'clock. Topics for the week as follows:

Monray—Unanswerable Question of Jesus.
Tuesday—A Day to be Remembered.
Wednesday—The Crisis in theGarden.
Thursday—Arrest and Tried.
Friday—Crucifixion and Communion service.

PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH

The services at the First Presbyterian church yesterday were in charge of the pastor, Rev. Charles S. Robertson. Mr. Robertson at the morning service took as his text the words of the second book of Kings, the seventh chapter and ninth verse. He spoke of the canvass for members now being undertaken by the church members and in the sermon he pointed out that Christ's love for the world embraced the whole world and that the members of the church should strive to encompass the world of their everyday life in their efforts to bring new members into the fold.

At the evening service the text was taken from the Acts of the Apostles, the twentieth chapter, twenty-second to twenty-fourth servse. Mr. Robertson portrayed the model Christian and explained the right kind of Christianity.

On Thursday evening there will be a preparatory service in the church at 7.30 o'clock and a ommunion servie will be held Friday morning.

FIRST BAPTIST CHURCH

The Young Men's Bible Class and the Baraca Class of the First Baptist church attended the evening services last night in a body. The church was thronged with worshipers who listened to an edifying sermon by the pastor. Rev. M. G. Buck, who took for his text the words of St. Luke, "The desire of the human heart for power is perfectly legitimate. The man who has such a desire is a normal man. The man who has not is an abnormal man. Any one person who is content to toss with the tide, backward and forward, lacks an element essential to true manhood. He is not a full man."

Mr. Buck, in referring to the quest for power which is present in almost every human heart, said that this quest is never wrong in itself, as God gives us the power and instinct to elevate ourselves among men, thereby gaining the respect and love of those around us. When we strive for power for a selfish purpose, however, God will rebuke us. Some of the most prominent characters in the history of the world abused the power placed in their hands as they were prompted by unworthy motives. The speaker placed Napoleon, Caesar and Alexander in this class.

Christ himself was portrayed as the greatest example of power used to a good end. He was powerful in order that He might stamp out the sin fo the world and His followers were also divinely endowed with that power that they might carry on His work. Mr. Buck said that the word power in itself signiles dynamic force. Ability to resist movement of any kind denotes stability but not dynamic force. But the Apostles and their dynamic force that enabled them not only to resist temptation but also to put forth efforts n behalf of others. Mr. Buck said that in many instances the silent force is a dynamic force and pointed to a quiet Christian life as one of the most powerful forces toward working good in others.

In portraying the lives of the Apostles, Mr. Buck showed their separation from the rest of mankind in not confirming to the customs and ideas of the world at that time; the sense of their stewardship, in that they regarded everything they possessed as entrusted to them by the Master; their willingness to serve God; and their perfect trust in their leader.

In closing, Mr. Buck impressed the desire to do things for Christ and the desire for power to enable us to live well.

Services will be held every night this week and on each evening Mr. Buck will speak on some subject connected with the last week of Christ's life on earth.

YARD IMPROVEMENT CONTEST IN LAFAYETTE IND.

By C. G. WOODBURY

Chief in Horticulture, Purdue University; Chairman Yard Improvement Committee, Lafayette Chamber of Commerce, Lafayette, Ind.

The civic beautification idea has existed in Lafayette for a number of years. As is the case in so many of our smaller cities, however, the ideals of communty betterment along esthetic lines were somewhat vague and ill-defined. Practical methods were not well understood, and, in fact, the whole idea of civic beautification rested in the minds of a comparatively few leaders and was not the common property of the majority of citizens.

Its was difficult to make any real progress toward carrying out a definite program, or to make any strong popular appeal, because there was no organization to assume definite leadership and responsibility. Some kind of organization is essential to serve as a focal point in centering popular thought for any collective action on civic problems. It is also almost axiomatic that such an organization should be non-political.

Lafayette "found itself" in the formation of a chamber of commerce. This body was organized along the broadest possible lines, the basic article of its creed being that nothing of interest to Lafayette was foreign to it.

It is not the purpose of this report to review the manifold activities of this representative body of citizens nor to dwell on the quickening influence that was felt immediately in a score of channels of community life. It is only necessary to say that in the Committee on Civic Beautification of the Lafayette Chamber of Commerce the interest in this subject, undirected and indefinite as it formerly had been, at once found a channel for effective expression.

The yard improvement work for 1914 was definitely started at an open meeting of the Civic Beautification Committee. This meeting was given publicity by the papers, and a general invitation to attend was extended through the press to all citizens interested in the subject of the meeting. Some general plans for yard improvement work were discussed informally at this time, and a sub-committe of the Civic Beautification Committee was appointed with the specific responsibility of organizing and carrying out a yard improvement movement. The work was planned and carried out by this sub-committee that 825 entries were registered, or about one yard in six in a city of 5,000 homes.

How Work Was Organized

When the sub-committee was appointed the chairman was named, and to him was assigned the work of organizing the committee and planning the work. This committee organization was formed very deliberately. Only those were asked to serve who were known to be thoroughly interested and who were in a position to give time and thought to the work on hand. Meetings were held weekly, on Monday evenings. They were brief or protracted as the business in hand demanded, but they were held regularly and attended loyally, which was largely responsible for the effectiveness of the preliminary work.

The Yard Improvement Committee at this time consisted of but four persons: the chairman, two ladies prominent in club, social and philanthropic activities of the city, and a local florist of sound judgment, long experience and public-spirited point of view.

This committee of four immediately began a survey of similar work done in other parts of the country, and carried on considerable correspondence with those in charge of home gardening and yard improvement enterprises. Little information was obtainable which seemed to bear directly on the immediate problem. From the inception of the movement the local papers were systematically furnished with short articles emphasizing the community advantages to be derived from civic beautification, and through the generous co-operation of the press a general and wide-spread interest in the movement was rapidly developed.

The committee had not proceeded far in the plans before it was evident that some method must be devised for reaching directly and personally all the citizens of the city who might be interested in the yard improvement work. To this end the city was divided into five districts of approximately equal population, and a leader was selected to have direct supervision of the work in each district. The Women's Council and the various clubs were interested through these district leaders, and thus the general interest continually being heightened by the press publicity was further strengthened. The district leaders were selected with the same care which guided the firts organization of the committee, and were at once asked to act with the committee in developing further plans, attending all meetings, etc. Rules for the contest were carefully formulated, a list of plants was selected for special adaptability in producing prompt results in yard improvement, descriptions of the plants were worked out, directions were prepared for yard platning and arrangement, and all this material, as well as a score card for judging yards and a registration blank for the contest, was published in bulletin form by the Chamber of Commerce.

Meanwhile each district leader was acting as chairman of a committee of his own selection and completing plans for a personal house-to-house registration canvass. Each district was subdivided by the district leader, and a definite area was given to certain helpers. It was the duty of each of these helpers to distribute the bulletin of information and the registration blank to all householders in his territory, to explain the purpose of the yard improvement work, and enlist the active co-operation and support of all citizens. Meanwhile timely articles were given the papers, with information as to the progress of the work, its meaning, etc. The rules and plant lists and dates of registration were published several times. The slogans for the campaign were 'A cleaner, greener city," and "Do it for Lafayette."

The Progress of the Work

With this organization the canvass was completed within a week and, as indicated above, 825 entries were secured. The pamphlet announced that prizes would be awarded the yards receiving the highest score, but the amount and distribution of the prizes was withheld for decision and announcement later. Many of those signing registration blanks informed the district workers that they were not interested in the competitive feature of the work, but wished to enter to give their definite support to the movement. Such non-competing entrants were designated on the cards.

Several minor plans were worked out to lend interest or to increase the value of the work. A collection of lantern slides was made, illustrating most of the plants recommended in the bulletin, the results of yard improvement work, good and bad taste in arrangement of yard planting, etc. These slides were used in a series of illustrated lectures given in the various districts by the chairman of the committee. The co-operation of the proprietors of the moving picture shows was also secured, and small sets of slides with appropriate explanatory legends were lent to each and used by each in rotation, without charge to the committee.

One of the local papers was interested in a photograph contest for which is offered $25 in prizes for the best pictures of yards entered in the yard improvement contest. Another paper was interested in an essay contest and offered $50 in prizes for the best essays giving an account of the work done and the results achieved in the improvement of yards entered in the contest. Rules for these contests were prepared by the committee.

The committee also made several camera tours early in the season and prepared illustrated articles for the local press calling attention to good and bad conditions in the town. Through the interest thus aroused and through the co-operation of the city administration definite results were achieved in stopping the dumping of refuse on vacant lots, etc., and the interest in a clean city increased.

The co-operation of the Board of Public Works was secured, and space was set aside in the city park for the use of the committee. Beds were laid out and planted with the annuals recommended in the planting lists published early in the spring. Seeds only were used, and, although some drawbacks were encountered, the beds furnished a very interesting and educational display through the summer, showing what could be accomplished through the use of easily grown annuals at a very small expense for seed. The plants in these beds were labeled so that visitors could identify them for future use in yard planting.

Results and Rewards

When the registration was completed, the committee was confronted with two problems—premiums and judging. It had been the first intention to make a canvass for donations to the premium list. When the matter was presented to the directors of the Chamber of Commerce and the situation was explained, that body very kindly appointed a committee from its own membership to make such a canvass, and, further than that, guaranteed the total amount needed for cash premiums. Some generous private donations had been made previously on the initiative of the donors, and the Chamber of Commerce pledged sufficient additional to bring the total to $250. A sweepstakes cash premium of $25 was offered for the highest scoring yard in the conest, and in addition $45 in cash, divided into ten premiums, was offered in each of the five districts.

It had been decided early in the season to score each competing yard three times, once each in June, July and August, no two scorings to be made less than two weeks apart. The Chamber of Commerce, feeling that the work was proving of value to the city, granted the request of the committee for a paid judge to put in full time on the yard improvement work for the three summer months. A graduate of the Horticultural Department of Purdue University was employed.

The employing of this judge was one of the most important steps in making the whole work most effective, as it enabled the committee to extend the yard improvement work in several directions. In connection with the inspection and scoring it was announced through the press that the expert service of the judge was free to any citizen of the community in need of suggestion and advice on yard problems, no distinction being made between those entered in the yard contest and others. A large number of special visits were thus made and directions given for the control of garden pests, fruit and shade tree insect enemies and diseases, etc.

Another valuable development of the work was the survey made by the yard improvement judge, under the direction of the committe, of the most serious tree pests which are threatening the life of the shade and fruit trees of the community. A report on San Jose scale was made by the chairman at the request of the Chamber of Commerce, and a plan was outlined for controlling this and other pests and at the same time of putting the yard improvement work on a permanent basis.

This plan, in brief, involves the co-operation of the city and the school authorities. The value of school garden work, of which yord improvement work is properly a sub-division, is being recognized in continually increasing degree by many of the most advanced communities in the country. The plan proposed is to employ a horticultural expert to have charge of the agricultural expert to have charge of the agricultural instruction and school garden work in the city's new vocational school; to have this expert employed on a twelve months' basis and paid partly by the city; to give him responsibility, in connection with summer school garden work, for the protection of the city trees from destruction by pests, and to make it possible through his office for the people of the city to have thorough spraying done under competent direction, and thus stop the present wholesale destruction being worked by scale and other pests.

In summary it may be said that the season's work was successful. Through the bulletin, the press, and, most of all, through the personal work of the helpers in each district, every person was directly reached by the work of the committee. A definite response was secured from nearly a thousand homes, a surprisingly large proportion.

An all summer competition was followed through, in spite of dry weather, by nearly 300. While this is a considerable shrinkage from the number for a contest, yet it is really a large number for a contest of this kind in a city of the population of Lafayette. The Cleveland Plain Dealer conducted a similar work and received the congratulations of business men and real estate dealers for its achievement, with a total of about 325 contestants in the great city of Cleveland.

The work of the judge has emphasized to the committee the desirability of making premanent provision for expert service to the community.

With all this the committee feels that the indirect and intangible effects of the season's work are the most potent and will be most lasting. The idea of civic beautification has been, to a certain extent, popularized and put on a practical concrete plane, and the people of the community who are interested in ideals of civic improvement and whose minds are receptive for more far-reaching work along this line may now be counted by hundreds instead of by tens.

Suggestions for the Coming Year

Certain suggestions which were included in the report of the judge of the contest will be followed in the contest in 1915.

A common remark to the inspector was, "You should have seen my yard in the spring!" It seems, therefore, that it would be most satisfactory if inspections could be made in late April and early May. The yards are in their dress of spring bloom then, and it is just at this time that the advice of an expert is most needed and that it will be most efficient. A September inspection would also be desirable, for then the prettiest fall flowers are in bloom. Then, too, the plants are being put away for winter and the competitor wants the advice and knowledge of an expert. In view of these facts, it is suggested that May, July and September inspections be made, instead of those in June, July and August.

For greatest efficiency in civic beautification work it is necessary to involve the schools. The slovenly citien who neglects his yard is not an impressionable object when worked upon directly, but may often be reached through the children. The finest and biggest a step a civic beautification committee may take is to interest the school authorities in the work and finally make it a school department.

About Sports Generally

Havana, March 27.—Jack Johnson expects to retain his championship by a knockout. He predicted today that he would send Jess Willard into slumberland before the twentieth round of their fight on April 5, and the big black means what he says.

"I will knock out Willard before the twentieth round." said white, and fears no man in the 24-foot ring.

"I will knock out Willard before the twentieth round," said Johnson. "It will take me four or five rounds to find out what he has up his sleeve and after that it will be easy for me to map out his plan and send him into clumberland. Willard's size does nt worry me. His allness makes the solar plexus all the more vulnerable, also his jaw for uppers."

Despite the reports that have been circulated of the poor condition of the champion, the title holder never looked better. He is as fast and shifty as ever. His wind is in fine condition and his heart action perfect. He boxes 10 to 15 rounds daily. Three sparring partners alternate in the boxing practice.

As soon as one finishes a round, another jumps in. The sparring partners are Bob Armstrong, the big negro; Colin Bell and Steamboat Bill Scott.

Johnson's defense is perfect. He also shows that he is not afraid of the punch. Purposely he lets his guard drop and allows his sparring partners to him on the stomach or jaw. Armstrong hit the champion in one exhibition six times on the jaw and Scott sent over 20 punches to the stomach. All of them were terrific wallops but none of them seemed to hurt the champion—or at least he did not appear to mind the punches.

His trainers are also confident that Johnson will retain ths title. Bob Armtsrong, who helped train Jim Jeffries for his battle with Jack Johnson, said today:

"Johnson will be in better shape for the Willard fight than he was when he fought Jeffries."

Johnson weighs 238 pounds today. He will enter the ring weighing about 225. Willard tipped the beam today at 248, and will take off about eight pounds before the day of the fight. The white man will have the advantage of about 15 pounds over the "big smoke." Willard is not putting any flourishes on his trainiing. He is going along in a smooth way, working hard to be fit and goes about his work with an air of confidence that his trainers brooks ill for the champion.

A dispatch received here from San Francisco says that Jack Welsh, who was selected as referee for the fight may decline the post.

The betting on the fight is varying, the odds being from 2 to 2½ to 1, that Johnson will win.

HOT LINERS

The psychology of this coming Johnson-Willard melee is an unusual mixture. Ever since Johnson overthrew Tommy Burns under the smear of the Southern Cross, the Smoke has hoisted a sable shadow across the heavyweight highway.

He has been the most unpopular champion in ring history, which extends from the Cain-Abel affair to the present hour. For various reasons and causes his defeat would be the most popular incident of the sportive decade.

Eight ball players out of ten are picking a Boston club to finish first this season—but the Boston club picked isn't the Braves. It's a bitunusual that 80 per cent. of those carrying and opinion are hurdling the world champs and picking a club that finished second.

Yet up and down the batting line of spring the dope is that Giants and Red Sox will battle again and resume their hectic meeting of 1912.

Not even a lofty line of rhetoric and fact is able to convince the average ball player that the Braves are a first class machine.

Part of this is due to the fact that the average player hasn't even yet had time to adjust himself to the big change. A year ago today the Braves were a second division outfit, backed up by a ten-year tradition of failure.

Nine months ago today the Braves were the worst looking ball club in the game, unkempt tail-enders of the most virulent sort.

So it has come hard for those players who have been looking on the Braves as succulent feeding for so long to suddenly turn and regard them as world champs and the best in the game.

But in underrating theBraves there are one or two features that most outside ball players have overlooked.

The Braves, among the regulars, have only two veterans on the club—Evers and Magee. The rest are young men who should be better this season than they were last year.

The Braves have at least five stars in Rudolph, James, Evers, Maranville and Magee. And five stars are well beyond the average club output.

The Braves have good pitching and good fielding and they have at least six men liable to rip a game wide open at any moment in Magee, Schmidt, Evers, Smith, Gowdy and Connolly.

* * *

And few ball players yet appreciate just what it means to a club to have a bench and field combination after the manner of George Stallings and Johnny Evers.

IS OSWEGO READY FOR WAR ATTACK

Oswego, March 29—How well is Oswego prepared for war and if invading troops threatened the military garrison at Fort Ontario what assistance could be expected of this city in the way of military trained men, food supplies and transportation? Officers of the Third Infantry at the Fort have been told to submit articles of Oswego's preparedness for war and how ready they are at their task. The work is divided. One officer has been instructed to ascertain the available food supplies in Oswego. Another officer will ascertain the number of military trained men in the city that might be called on in case of emergency and be able to respond. Another officer will learn just what ammunition and arms are available at first call, while another will find out the transportation facilities of the city and how quickly a body of men might be rushed to the aid of the city. In view of their importance in the present European conflict, the number of automobiles here will also receive consideration in the articles prepared

The work now being done by the officers is something entirely new at the Post, but in line with similar work that has been ordered at every army post, in getting a more thorough knowledge of just how well protected this country would be in case of war.

THE CITY BEAUTIFUL

STREET CLEANING A COMMUNITY PROBLEM.

Efficient street cleaning is not merely a process of collection and removal of dust and waste, says Carol Aronovici in the Town Improvement Magazine. The cleanliness of our streets depends upon conditions inherent in the spirit of the people, the character and planning scheme upon which the community has been developed and the method of administering the laws and ordinances at the command of the governmental agencies in charge of their enforcement. A street cleaning budget is therefore a false index of the character and amount of cleaning that is being done in the community and completely fails to convey a true conception of the actual cleanliness that prevails in such a community.

American methods of street cleaning have long been the subject of the most frequent and caustic criticism, which, however, has seldom resulted in constructive advice and efficient service.

A chaotic multiplicity of experiments have been made in recent years, but they lack scientific backing and are handicapped by a false conception of economy which by the employment of superannuated and inefficient workers tends to save expense in the poor department and avoid congestion in the old men's home, to the detriment of street cleaning and public comfort.

Until recently a street, from the standpoint of municipal government, was considered a thoroughfare, or a means of reaching various parts of the community without regard to the surrounding property, be that of a business or residential character. A closer observation, however, makes it clear that the street is essentially the means of approaching a home and of serving its conveniences. It is the hallway which connects the school and the church, the factory and the office with the home. From the standpoint of the tenement dweller, the street is the nursery and the playground of the young, the social center and the meeting place of the adult, the free market place for the transaction of business and the display and distribution of the food supply. Not infrequently during hot weather the street is the common bedroom of the dweller in the congested, ill ventilated and overheated tenement house district. With such broad functions it is clear that the construction and care of streets implies more than the requirements of accessibility, easy grade and safety. What is needed is a permanent adjustment to the needs of the neighborhood of the methods of construction and maintenance of streets so as to make their use healthful, safe and pleasant.

Car Parks or Barns.

Car parks or barns for storing cars, either in the open or under roof, while in some cases of necessity located at convenient points along the main traffic lines, should be arranged in such a manner as not to be architecturally unsightly. They should be of such a character as to harmonize with the surroundings, if not to be an improvement upon them, since they are at best a nuisance and an impediment to traffic. The company should maintain strict discipline and not have large crowds of motormen lounging about the streets to the annoyance of the public. The streets are for the use of the public and not for the transaction of the business of private corporations.

In most cases it will be possible to have car barns located at or near the ends of the lines, while in other cities large union stations, serving at once for passengers and for car storage, may be erected.

Beautifying California.

Sixty California cities and nearly 100 civic and commercial organizations have combined to take action toward beautifying the whole state during the year 1915. The work has been in progress for almost a year, and the popularity of the movement should be indicated by the fact that the supervisors of Los Angeles county have appropriated more than half a million dollars to defray the cost of beautifying public property in that particular county.

THE HEIGHT LIMITS OF VARIOUS CITIES.

There Are Serious Dangers From Vary Tall Buildings.

The sky line of the business district of Portland, Ore., continues to change in marvelous fashion, says Ellis F. Lawrence, an architect of that city. With the advent of the real skyscraper danger of congestion and loss of light becomes apparent when the narrow streets are considered. Portland is laid out in such a manner that everything possible should be done to prevent congestion. The business center should be spread out rather than condensed.

AMERICAN CITIES.	Feet.
Portland	200
Boston (District A)	125
Boston (District B)	80 to 100
Charleston	125
Los Angeles	150
Manchester, N. H.	125

A recent report of the heights of buildings commission for the city of New York gives the latest information on this serious matter of the dangers of uncontrolled heights of buildings. Among the reasons for the regulation of heights of buildings are the following:

The preservation of the right to light and air to all those who own or occupy adjacent property.

As a health provision, the existing lack of regulation ultimately leading to injury to health of thousands employed to work under intolerable conditions of artificial light and lack of wholesome ventilation.

The concentration of property values to the detriment of an average development of the city as relates to building.

The fire risk. In fighting fires in buildings of great height the fire department is seriously handicapped, as its apparatus is effective for buildings only 100 feet, or eight stories, high.

The elimination of congestion at rush hours.

AID TEACHING OF CIVICS.

An interesting contribution to the study of civics has been made by the Free Public library of Jersey City, which has recently published three pamphlets describing the government of the city, county and state in which the library is located. The publications have been prepared primarily for the use of the schools and are very brief and elementary, but more advanced students will find them useful. Although treating only of local conditions, they have a wider interest owing to the fact that one of the pamphlets describes the operation of commission government in the largest city of the state in which it has been introduced, and the other explains the government of a typical New Jersey county.

The Jersey City library has done much excellent work in the matter of instruction in local civics, and the compilation and distribution of monographs on the subject is one of the most interesting features of the work. Many thousands of these publications have been printed and distributed by the library. They are used in the schools as textbooks and for supplementary readings and have been of great assistance to teachers.

Building reports of the twenty-five larger cities in the United States for the year 1914 show a heavy decrease in comparison to the previous year. Only nine cities in the list show gains in building expenditures for the year, these cities being Baltimore, Boston, Cincinnati, Pittsburgh, Cleveland, Toledo, Minneapolis, St. Paul and Seattle. The cities showing a decrease are as follows: Buffalo, 10 per cent; Chicago, 9 per cent; Dallas, 34 per cent; Detroit, 8 per cent; Indianapolis, 16 per cent; Kansas City, 5 per cent; Los Angeles, 41 per cent; Milwaukee, 25 per cent; Newark, 37 per cent; New York city, 14 per cent; Philadelphia, 9 per cent; Portland, Ore., 44 per cent; San Francisco, 35 per cent; St. Louis, 12 per cent; Washington, 2 per cent. The decrease for the 150 larger cities of the country is estimated at about 10 per cent in comparison with 1913.

Good Economy.

Clinton Rogers Woodruff, secretary of the National Municipal league and editor of the National Municipal Review, says of cities governed by a commission or a commission manager that "out of sixty-nine commission cities investigated sixty-one were found to be running at less expense per capita than the average of the 196 cities of all classes considered. Nine Iowa cities, operating under the commission form of government, have lived within their income for the first time in their history."

THE MOTHERS' PENSION BILL

By Frederic T. Cardoze

Albany, March 29.—The Hill-McCue so-called "Mothers' Pension Bill," is now in the hands of Governor Whitman, having passed the Senate unanimously and the Assemblymen by a vote of 129 to 8. What action the Governor will take on the bill does not seem to be known by any one, but it is understood that he will give a hearing upon it at the request of those who are opposed to the measure.

This bill is in but one respect a departure from the present poor law methods of relieving the poor. Instead of distributing the moneys that may be appropriated for relief through the ordinary poor law officers, such as the overseers of the poor and the like, the bill provides for the granting of aid to widowed mothers through boards of child welfare, to be appointed for the counties by the county judges and for the city of New York by the mayor. The county boards are to consist of seven members including the county superintendent of the poor, who is to be a member ex-officio, and at least two of whom shall be women. The New York city board is to consist of nine members including the commissioner of public charities who is to be a member ex-officio, and at least three of whom shall be women.

The main purpose of the bill is to remove the widowed mother and her children from the ordinary methods of town relief and to place them under the care of unpaid boards of child welfare who will not only look after them without regard to any question of politics that may arise, but will act as their special guardians and protectors and will seek secure, through the arousing of public sentiment, and otherwise sufficient means, to provide adequate relief for this class of the poor.

These boards of child welfare cannot, however, expend any money either for expenses or relief until it has specifically appropriated for such purposes by the board of supervisors in the counties and by the fiscal authorities of the city of New York. So far as the expenditure of moneys is concerned, the act is purely permissive as the appropriating authorities are not compelled to grant any moneys whatever unless they so desire. Besides this, in no case is a mother to receive any relief unless it is necessary in order to enable her to keep her children from being placed in institutions. Even then she is to be paid no more than the locality would have to pay in order to have the children cared for in an insitution. Further than this the mother must have lived in the locality for at least two years before she would be ligible for assistance and must also be the widow of a citizen who was a resident of the State for a year preceding his death. With all these safeguards thrown around the operation of this proposed act, its supporters are of the opinion that its administration in this State will no cost very much and they also believe that the total cost will not be as great as it would be if he children were sent to institutions and supported there for some years. This they assert, has been the experience of Chicago and other cities where similar laws are in force. They are also of the opinion that while there may be quite a demand for the relief at first, the applications will soon be no more than normal when it is found that the plan is not a pension scheme but a relief measure only.

There seems to be no reason to believe that the proposed new law will have any injurious effect upon the institutions although they man not perhaps, have to be enlarged so rapidly after the law gets into operation. As, however, they are not money-making institutions and it is very difficult to get funds for their suitable enlargement, this is not regarded even by their managers as an unmixed evil.

ROUND ABOUT

News Culled that is Pertiment to Late Happenings

Sufficient vegetables can be raised on a quarter-acre lot to supply a family of six persons for an entire year if close attention is given to the rotation and succession of crops says the Department of Agriculture. The same lot will accommodate such permanent crops as asparagus, rhubarb and small fruits and berries, if care is taken in arranging the garden. It will provide fresh vegetables for the summer and enough for canning for use in the winter. A smaller area, such as is found in the average city backyard, will accommodate several of the smaller crops, which are in constant demand by the average housewife.

The constitutionality of the law passed in 1913 prohibiting work by women in factories between 10 p. m. and 6 a. m. was upheld yesterday by the Court of Appeals. Its validity was attacked by employers on the ground that it unduly interfered with the right of adult women to contract for their labor. In the opinion, written by Judge Hiscock, in which all the other judges concur, it is held that the Legislature was justified in believing that night work in factories was so detrimental to the health of women that it ought to be prohibited for their own sakes and in the interest of public welfare.

The new war-tax stamps are printed on a poor quality of paper and the ink has a tendency to blur.

The European war has caused a shortage in elephants in this country, according to Ernest Siegfried, manager of Louis Ruhe's wild animal farm at Woodside, Queens. Saturday he received a rush order for six elephants to be delivered at once to the Barnum & Bailey circus, but he was unable to fill it. The activity of the fleets of the allies in stopping German commerce is responsible for this shortage," said Mr. Siegfried. "The importation of elephants has been carried on chiefly in the past by Germans through the port of Hamburg."

According to a Vienna dispatch by way of Venice, it has just been learned that the German Emperor paid a secret visit to Emperor Franz Joseph last week to urge him to cede Trentino and Trieste to Italy as the price of the latter's neutrality. The conference was held at the time the Kaiser was semi-officially reported to be in consultation with Field Marshal von Hindenbury on the eastern front.

Further returns from the general elections held in Japan on Wednesday last to choose a new House of Representatives give increased indications that the Sefyukai or Conservative party was defeated. In the last Diet of Conservatives were in a majority and were opposed to the military programme of the cabinet. The election everywhere is regarded by officials as having conformed more closely to the requirements of the law than any held since the granting of the constitution.

The new Alabama law prohibiting publication of liquor advertisements in newspapers printed or sold in the State was upheld yesterday by Chancellor W. R. Chapman. The decision was in a test case brought by the State against the Montgomery Advertiser.

Because some ministers have announced that they will hold Easter services in Patterson, N. EASTER HAT.

Barnyard Straw Crowned With Wreath of Flowers.

SPRING CREATION.

Variations of the sailor hat are many, and now is the time when women are making their selections of hats. Every woman loves hats. Every woman goes forth to buy a new hat with a pleasurable feeling in her heart which only the prospective purchase of a hat inspires. She likes to order a new suit. She likes to pore over fashion magazines and papers in search of a new style for her evening gown. The possession of new gloves, shoes, silk stockings or blouses fills her with joy. But hats stand alone in their glory. They occupy a niche in her mind which is theirs, and theirs only.

That hat shown in the illustration is of brown barnyard straw, braided in wicker effect and worn with a decided slant. The crown is of sand colored velvet, encircled with a wreath of flowers and fruits in varied colors.

WOMAN'S UNIQUE SPHERE.

What Casarini, the Futurist, Says About Her Clothing.

Casarini, the clever futurist, who has made it his business or an important part of his business in America to study femininity, thinks that there is a needless amount of debate as to the sphere of woman.

"Woman has a sphere," he says.

"Fancy for a moment a world without the ornament of woman's art—the art of her hair, the art of her physical beauty, the art of her clothes. How stupid it would be, how unthinkable!

"Yes, I know that man once was the highly decorated animal, and you know what the world was then. Civilization really dates from the time when women became the decorative element. Man's clothes now are not 'dress' at all. Woman is the melody; man is the accompaniment.

"Of course there always will be people who will insist that clothes are merely for utility. Foolishness! Even a man, and certainly a woman, on a desert island would think of clothes as something more than mere covering.

"In human society clothes become a language. The rashest objector will be found following either a present or a past fashion—talking the clothes language of his kind. Not to do so is to be misunderstood, to be separated. In this language woman has charge of the elegances. It is she who adds the higher beauty. It is she who adds the whimsical. Whatever may be said of her sense of humor, she has a keen sense of humor as to clothes. She grasps the art value, the diversity and surprise value of the whimsical, never committing the absurdity of taking clothes solemnly, as so many men do."

To Remove Fruit Stains.

Fruit stains will be eradicated easily if one will wet them with a little camphor before washing. Then wash and the stains will disappear. Glycerin may be used in a similar manner, being sure in both cases to use it before water touches the stain.

For grease stains there is nothing better than eucalyptus oil. This may be used on delicate fabrics without injury, as it will evaporate rapidly, leaving no mark.

To Dry the Back.

Strips of Turkish toweling cut from towels that are beginning to show wear may be used to pull back and forth across the back or be hemmed into wash cloths and still give plenty of wear.

Substitute For Butter.

Olive oil as a substitute for butter is impossible for the delicious flavor of many French and Italian dishes. The American housewife who experiments with oil as a butter substitute in cooking finds that it has many advantages. It does not burn as quickly as butter and therefore does not require so careful watching. It also lends a rich flavor which cannot be secured in any other way.

PUNISHED FOR WIVES.

A habit developed by French wives of visiting their soldier husbands at the front, according to the Frankfurter Zeitung, has led General Joffre to prohibit such visits and warn the husbands of punishment for their wives' disregard of this order. In publishing the text of the order the Frankfurter Zeitung says that the perseverance of the wives in eluding the military guards is remarkable in that it is very difficult for any noncombatant to get to the French lines, even the official war correspondents being allowed to go there only for very brief periods. The paper cites the following order, published in the Tempe, as issued by the commander of one infantry regiment:

"Every married man has the duty, as required by civil law, to strive for the obedience of his wife. Therefore every married soldier must be in a position to prevent his wife from visiting him. The worse for the married men if they have not sufficient authority over their wives to enforce the obedience demanded by the civil law. Therefore they are to be made responsible for the obedience of their wives. If in former times a married woman succeeded in getting into the army, inasmuch as it was not possible to throw her into prison, her husband was imprisoned instead, since he was made responsible for the poor military training of his wife. That method was not so foolish as it appears to be at first glance, and it will be applied again in such cases as occur."

Mrs. Carl Muller of Yaphank has inserted an advertisement in several Long Island papers offering for adoption a newborn war babe, whose mother, a German woman, is stopping at Mrs. Muller's home.

"The baby's mother, who doesn't want her name known save to the couple who, she hopes, will adopt her little daughter, does not know whether she is a widow or not," said Mrs. Muller to a reporter. "The mother is a friend of mine who came to the United States after her husband had been forced to fight for Germany. She has tried repeatedly to obtain word from or of her husband without result, and she has no knowledge whether he has been killed or is still fighting. She feels that she cannot care for her little daughter, who was born on Feb. 27, and is a little dear, and she is willing to give full surrender to a couple who can convince her that the baby will have a good home and kind treatment."

The Slavs.

The word "Slav," including Serbians, Russians and allied races, had nothing originally to do with slaves or slavery. Its proper form is "Sklav," or "Sclave" with the "K" sound, in Latin tongues "Schiavi" or "Schiavoni." German folk speech used the word "Wend" to designate a Slav, the Prussians themselves being originally Wends.—Exchange.

DON'TS FOR MARKETERS.

Don't run "charge" accounts if you can possibly avoid it.

Don't deal with any one who objects to reweighing your purchase.

Don't buy from any one whose weights and measures are not officially stamped.

Don't forget that the best way is to reweigh on correct scales in your own home.

Don't let the dealer keep his hand upon a container or a projecting bone while on the scales.

Don't buy twine, trays, paper and fancy packages, but insist upon sixteen ounces net weight in every pound.

Don't let your child, servant or husband do your buying at the store or market when you can do it yourself.

Don't wait until your purchase is wrapped before asking, "How much?" but ask before placing your order.

SEASON'S COMBINATION.

SEPARATE BLOUSE AND SKIRT.

The reinstatement of the blouse and separate skirt is sure. And be it known the utility blouse this season is very severe and exquisitely tailored, has a high collar and long sleeves and is buttoned straight down before and right up under milady's dimpled chin.

Such a blouse is shown in the accompanying illustration. It is developed of cream white georgette crepe, with a tiny turnover collar and turned back cuffs. Nothing could be simpler or smarter.

And we cannot escape pockets if we would! Illustrated is a circular tailored skirt of covert cloth. Triangular pockets are placed at the front, finished with trimming of tiny self covered buttons. The skirt is short to display patent leather boots with tops of covert cloth.

THE GROWING GIRL.

Fashions Seem Made For Her Special Needs This Spring.

For the girl who is neither a child nor a young lady the present fashions seem made for her special needs. We all many time in the reign of the narrow skirt have deplored the fact that the young girl with her undeveloped figure should don such an unbecoming style. No longer will this be necessary, for the empire waist with the fuller skirt will beyond a doubt be a more graceful mode for her young ladyship. The skirt that is plain in the back and the front with the fullness at the sides will be a close rival of the gathered or plaited skirt. There is another style that bids for favor, and that is the gored skirt, well fitting at the top, but with a decided flare below the knees. The plaited skirts are invariably stitched below the hips, and from there they flare in the approved manner.

Bolero and Eton jacket effects are to be selected by the wise parent for the growing girl. The high placed belt is also a becoming style.

While the beruffled skirt is not a new mode for the young girl, there is a new method of disposing of the ruffles. In one girlish affair they were applied at each side of the front, leaving a panel.

Worsted Embroidery.

HONESTY.

If honesty is the best policy in business it is also the best policy when one has done wrong and is confronted with the question whether or not to confess. A confession is worse than none at all.

SAVES WOMAN FROM BULL.

Boulder, Colo.—The presence of mind and prompt action of Larry Fox, a motorman of a Denver and Interurban car out of Boulder, saved Edith Fair from death or serious injury.

Wearing a red sweater Miss Fair, who is housemaid at the home of Frank Anderson, on the eastern limits of the city, started for the junction to intercept the car to Denver. While hurrying across a vacant lot she heard the bellowing of a big bull.

One glance was sufficient to warn Miss Fair that she was the object of attraction of the maddened animal. The terrified woman fled toward the railway track with the enraged beast not more than fifty yards behind her.

The interurban car at this moment shot around the curve, but a short distance away. Motorman Fox was quick to see the young woman's danger, and after turning off the current and applying the brakes jumped from the vestibule, seized her by the wrist and lifted her to the car almost at the same instant the animal brushed against the coach.

Miss Fair, who had fainted when the excitment was over, was soon revived, but postponed her trip to Denver.

August Harding, the owner of the bull, says he has never known the animal to act unruly before, and attributes its antics to the red sweater Miss Fair was wearing.

WOODPECKER ROBS A TOWN.

Causes Short Circuit Resulting In Excessive Water Bill.

The contract for filling the municipal reservoir is let to a power company and an electric indicator notifies the engineer when the required depth of water has been provided.

For some months the bill has been regarded as excessive and the number of hours required daily to fill the basin has varied to a marked degree.

Investigation has placed the blame on an innocent woodpecker which chose one wire for a perch and with its tail touching the other wire made a short circuit so that the engineer's signal to stop pumping was controlled by the woodpecker's rest rather than the depth of water provided.

DYNAMITE SAVES DOG.

By the use of dynamite and crowbars Bob, Robert Washer's foxhound, was freed from the burrow in which he was imprisoned, near Wilkesbarre, Pa.

The dog ran into the burrow after a fox and could not turn around or back out, as he had dislodged a large stone behind him in his plunge after the fox. Washer said he would dynamite the whole hill before he would abandon Bob to his fate.

At first efforts to free him by dynamiting failed. Enough stones were brought down to make it possible to complete his rescue by the use of crowbars.

TEACH POLICE TO FIND CRIMINALS

EXPOUNDS GERMAN SCIENCE

One Murderer Betrayed by Match, Another by Teeth and Third by Sawdust—Foreign Policemen Gave Wide Berth to Runaway Horses, Making For Doorways and Areaways.

About 200 police captains, inspectors and high officials of the detective bureau gathered in the lecture room at New York police headquarters to take an advance course in crime detection from Raymond B. Fosdick, who had a story to tell about the latest tricks for catching criminals in Europe.

Police Commissioner Woods introduced Mr. Fosdick with a few remarks about his plan to bring together the principal officials of the police department to talk over criminal matters at least once or twice a month. He said he was borrowing the plan from Berlin, where he had learned it was working quite successfully.

"Mr. Fosdick will tell you about the superior results of the Berlin system," said Commissioner Woods. Mr. Fosdick, however, started his lecture by telling that he saw five policemen in a European capital give a wide berth to a runaway horse, making for doorways and areaways along with the frightened populace.

"And the sight of those fleeing police," said Mr. Fosdick, "made me glow with pride for our own policemen, for I knew, of course, that in New York there would have been five policemen hanging to the bridle reins, every one of them doing his utmost to bring the horse to terms quite regardless of his own safety."

From runaway horses Mr. Fosdick turned to stories of thieves and pickpockets who were caught by methods not yet introduced here.

Thief Smells of Garlic.

"One of these methods," he said, "is to put a detective on watch at the side of any person in a street car who is found smelling strongly of garlic. The garlic thief has become a standardized institution in German cities. He makes his breath very objectionable with garlic and then breathes into the face of some one standing near him in a crowded car. The victim of the garlic fumes turns his head away and makes it comparatively easy for the thief to rifle his pockets.

"But the chief advance over our methods in detecting crime is in the use of photographs and the microscope. For instance, the police on finding a man's body on the sidewalk of a Berlin street proceeded to draw a chalk line twenty-five feet in diameter around the body. Then they photographed the whole space within the circle. The picture of a match loomed up in the photograph alongside the body. The match itself was carefully photographed, and the photograph was enlarged. A man was arrested on the merest suspicion, and in his pocket was found a bundle of matches of the Chinese sort. The match on the walk was fitted exactly into a vacant space in this bundle, and enlarged photographs of the bundle and the burned stub clinched the fact that they were of the same texture of wood. On pressure being exerted after this clew had been obtained the prisoner broke down and confessed that he had struck the match in the dark to see if his victim was really dead.

Teeth Marks in Pipe.

"The police found a pipe beside a dead man that evidently had been left by the murderer. Teeth marks in the pipe stem indicated very large front teeth, peculiarly spaced. A man with such teeth was singled out from a suspected group, and he was forced to admit that the pipe was his after the dents in its stem had been found to fit his teeth. He confessed that he was guilty of the murder.

"A murderer, in escaping, shed an overcoat into the arms of a policeman who had grappled with him. The coat was placed in a bag and beaten with a stick until all the dust in it had come out. The dust was analyzed. It was found to be mostly a fine sawdust. Besides the sawdust there were bits of gine. The police concluded that the coat belonged to a carpenter and joiner, and on this clew worked until they found the man they wanted."

Mr. Fosdick urged that New York policemen should be interested in the [illegible] He suggested [illegible] Bertillon [illegible] be brought into contact with the New York department through a system of interchanging finger prints and methods of identification. He said that in Europe it was often the practice to file with each thief's record a complete analysis of his method of working, his favorite style of jimmy, his method of breaking into a house, the kind of articles he mostly cared for, and the kind of places he visited when seeking associates. Detectives provided this information, he said, and in addition kept plaster casts of the jimmy marks made by burglars on the doors of buildings. He said that thieves had been caught through the discovery that a mark left by a jimmy corresponded to the favorite tool of some particular burglar.

EIGHTY THOUSAND WERE EGGS, NOT RUSSIANS.

An explanation of the origin of the canard, which received wide circulation and credence early in the war, to the effect that 80,000 Russian troops had reached Scotland from Archangel, Russia's White sea port, en route to France, appears to be found in a common commercial custom.

Russia exports millions of eggs to England, and in the trade these eggs are known as "Russians," just as the thousands of rabbits sent to England from Belgium are known as "Ostends," as oysters are known as "Marennes" or "Whitstables," or in the United States as "Blue Points" or "Cape Cods."

It may easily have been the case, and this is believed by many to be the explanation, that a Russian wholesale dealer telegraphed to his commission agent in England, "Eighty thousand Russians sent via Archangel," and the message may have been taken by some one through whose hands it passed to refer to troops instead of eggs.

The telegraphic employee may have told a friend and so have started the rumor, which grew until few correspondents could resist giving it credence, even though they had some idea of the difficulties of moving 80,000 men to Archangel and undoubtedly wondered why such forces should be landed in Scotland instead of being carried to a French port.

FLAG FOR VICE PRESIDENT.

The vice president of the United States is to have an official flag. Whenever he visits an American warship his flag will flutter from the masthead. The flag will be a snow white square of bunting, on the field of which will be a blue bird representing the eagle in the coat of arms of the United States. The president's flag consists of the coat of arms of the nation on a blue field.

This is the first time that there has been prescribed for the vice president a distinctive flag to be displayed on naval vessels while he is on board. The president, the secretaries and the assistant secretaries of the departments of war and the navy all have distinctive flags. The admirals, vice admirals and rear admirals have distinctive flags.

It remained for Secretary Daniels to provide the vice president with a flag. His action grows out of the fact that Mr. Marshall is going to San Francisco to represent President Wilson at the exposition. He is to be received on board the cruiser Colorado, the flagship of Admiral Howard, commander in chief of the Atlantic fleet; hence the new flag, which will be a permanent institution of honor to the vice president.

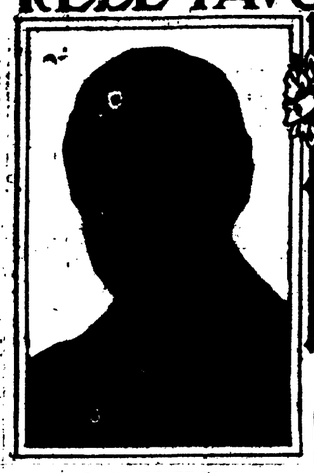
Harvard Professor's Discovery May Control Growth.



A series of experiments with the so called ductless glands of the human body, which, if successful, may make it possible for the man of science to control the physical stature of the human being, is now being conducted at the Harvard Medical school.

Hundred of cases treated at the hospitals connected with the medical school serve to bear out Professor Cannon's conclusions. Strange changes in the human structure and mind development have already been noted and tabulated as the result of different surgical and medical treatments of gland diseases. By the giving or withholding of gland drugs the weight of patients has been increased or diminished at will.

Professor Cannon states that [illegible] discoveries in this field [illegible] that followed the study of [illegible]

REEL FAVORITES OFF THE FILM

D. W. GRIFFITH.

A development no one would have believed possible a few years ago is seen in the establishment of D. W. Griffith's "The Birth of a Nation" as a regular Broadway attraction, playing to absolute capacity on a two dollar scale. "The Birth of a Nation" is indeed more than a film, for nearly 100 persons are employed in the mechanical effects and music plays during the unreeling of its 12,000 feet of celluloid, yet not a word is spoken from the stage during the two and three-quarter hours' performance.

Miss La Salle appears in "An Innocent Sinner," a drama which was tremendously popular some years ago. An all star cast of players surround the Broadway favorite.

SCENE FROM "KILLED AGAINST ORDERS."

"Killed Against Orders" is a drama by Mary Rider in three parts. In it Odanah Durand attends a ball and loses a valuable bracelet. The district attorney, Wallace Maynard, whom Odanah meets at the ball, calls the police. At her home, later in the evening, Odanah sees her father enter through a window, and immediately he hands her the jewels stolen at the Rice home. Durand, a master criminal, who is idolised by the gang, goes to them and tells them that he is through. They plead with him, and he consents to assist in robbing the home of a millionaire that evening. The owner of the place is killed by one of the robbers, and Durand, who did not fire the shot, is caught. At the trial Maynard tricks Odanah into offering condemning evidence, and her father is sentenced to life imprisonment. She turns criminal, but Maynard's love changes her after he gets a pardon for her father.

On Anastasia island, at St. Augustine, Fla., there is, or at least was, a group of old buildings going quietly to decay until George W. Terwilliger, the director, who is in St. Augustine with a special company of players headed by Ormi Hawley and Earl Metcalfe, happened to see them. First of all, Terwilliger rebuilt the fronts of two of the houses and staged a smugglers' drama there; then he cut the roof off one of them and used the house to make interiors for another drama; next, to get a "punch" for an insurrection he bombarded one of the houses with cannon and blew it up with dynamite.

Ben Turpin is something of an acrobat as well as comedian. In the comedy "Curiosity" Turpin plays the part of a madman. He sets up a table and juggles brooms, chairs and other pieces of furniture in a way that would make a professional juggler envious.

The Housewives' League

The Housewives' League of America started three years ago with seven members. It now numbers almost a million, and has branches not only in every state in the Union, but also in Canada, Japan, and Germany. Its recent opening of a great clearing house in New York, and its plan for another in Atlantic City before summer, have given it a new prominence, although it had already gained recognition by other acts; as, for example, forcing down the price of butter and eggs and carrying on a campaign for clean groceries.

The establishment of the league in headquarters of its own—it has a whole floor at 25 West 45th Street—will make it easier for it to accomplish what has always been one of its chief objects; that is, to bring the housewife into closer and more intelligent contact with the producer. Much of the traditional work of women—weaving, baking, sewing, washing, ironing—has been taken out of the house; but although it is done outside and, so to speak, at wholesale, the women of the household ought still to be in touch with it and to control it. It is also one of the objects of the league to give women a chance to work with the manufacturers of food products, and to learn what food products are unwholesome.

The new headquarters contain a library with the best books on home economics, and an auditorium where there will be daily lectures on such subjects as legal weights and measures, domestic science, sanitation, agricultural production, prices, domestic architecture, home art, and ready-made clothing. There will also be educational conferences on infant feeding, dietetics, refrigeration of household supplies, and kindred topics, and a kitchen where foodstuffs can be analyzed and where demonshould be cooked. The league will also give attention to the matter of fabrics, and to fashions, inso far at least as they touch health, comfort, beauty, or expense.

Besides bringing about cooperation between producers and consumers, the league hopes to enroll what it calls "domestic employees", and to teach them how to use labor-saving contrivances, and to take advantage of expert advice.

In brief, the league is trying to train women for the great profession of housekeeping, which includes not merely a knowledge of cooking, washing, ironing and sweeping, but that broader and higher knowledge through which alone the wife can attain the same kind of efficiency at home that her husband tries for in the management of his business.—Youth's Companion.

ESCAPED INJURY

Motorcycle Tipped Over While Avoiding Collision.

Edward Laveck of this city with a new motorcycle and side car started for Syracuse eSaturday afternoon with a local motor dealer as a passenger to make a test. Everything was progressing nicely until Liverpool was reached. There, while the motor was making record time, a dull-witted farmer lad, with a horse and buggy, blocked the road. Expecting him to turn out, Laveck did not slow down but sounded his signal. The farmer lad did not make the proper move, however, and the result was that Laveck, passenger and machine were forced to leave the road and intrude upon nearby pastoral domains.

The machine, although it turned over, was not damaged and both of the passengers are able to accept congratulations today upon their escape from injury.

DYNAMITE FOR FISH

The Fish and Game laws of this State expressly forbid the dynamiting of any waters in the State for the purpose of killing fish, but the old canal bed in this city was dynamited in several places Saturday by foreigners in the attempt to make a record haul before the canal bed is filled. The fish responded readily to the sportsmanlike method of hook and line, but the dynamiters decided to take a chance and make a big haul in the evident hope that the occurence would be overlooked.

List of Things Which Have Been Done by Strong Chambers of Commerce Elsewhere. They Suggest the Possibilities of Fulton's Strong Chamber of Commerce. History Repeats Itself

San Diego, Cal.—The Chamber of Commerce established a permanent exhibit of the products of San Diego county, which was shown in the building occupied by the organization. Most of the articles shown in this exhibit were preserved fruit, vegetables, and flowers, but a good many manufactured materials were shown also.

* * *

Omaha, Neb.—Among the methods used to encourage "home trade" in Omaha, Neb., are home trade excursions. These trips are held about once every two weeks during the spring and fall and are arranged to take in the city's manufacturing and wholesale establishments, while they are in operation. They are made either in automobiles or special street cars and usually anywhere from fifty to four hundred people take advantage of them. They are made exceedingly interesting and furnish the manufacturers and wholesalers an excellent opportunity to place their products before the people.

* * *

St. Paul, Minn.—The efforts of the association of commerce brought about a street lighting system in the down-town section covering about 50 block which had previously been very inadequately illuminated. This change was purely the result of an educational campaign, for the expense of the installation was borne by the property owners.

Rochester, N. Y.—A marked improvement of the condition of the streets has been brought about by the Chamber of Commerce. A street pavement postcard was mailed to each of the members asking them to indicate the exact location of any defective pavement that had come to their attention. A squad of committeemen investigated the reports of defects covering the territory in automobile, and then reported their findings to the proper department of the city government. They received prompt co-operation from thec ity and an investigation repeated a number of months later showed that all these defects had been remedied.

The Rochester Chamber of Commerce also inaugurated a plan to eliminate unnecessary lawsuits among its members. Their plan consists simply in urging their members to abritrate cases in dispute in preference to taking them to law, and providing as arbitrators public spirited men of a high order whose decisions would be acceptable to both parties involved. It has already proved exceedingly effective.

Columbia, S. C.—The Chamber of Commerce defrayed the expenses of bringing a lecturer of broad experience to deliver a series of talks on salesmanship. Over 1200 proprietors, managers and clerks attended these lectures. The affect of these talks on retail business in Columbia has been immeasurable. Reforms, new methods and increases in efficiency have been established in many Columbia business houses directly traceable to the influence of these lectures.

* * *

Lafayette, Ind.—Through the efforts of the Chamber of Commerce a three day package-car service was inaugurated over the Wabash R. R. between that city and New York.

Greenville, S. C.—The Chamber of Commerce has made strong efforts to establish close relation between the city and surrounding country. A community picnic was held and was attended by 10,000 or 12,000 people. This represented Greenville's attempt to show her appreciation of the hospitality which had always been manifested by the people of the surrounding country towards the people of Greenville. The people of Greenville feel that no single thing the city has ever done has contributed so much in behalf of closer relationships between the people of Greenville and the surrounding country. They have also established a rest room which is open all the year for the convenienc of incoming farmers. They have made it a point to attend farmers' meetings in various sections of the country and some of them have made addresses. They are now working to create a hitching lot in the city for the use of people from the country.

FRENCH

Paris, via London.—The following official communiaction was issued by the War Office today:

"The enemy has bombarded Nieuport and Nieuport-Bains (two miles to the northwest), but the damage done to the bridge thrown across the Yser was not of great importance.

"In Champagne there has been an artillery action in the neighborhood of Beausejour.

"In the Argonne there has been cannonading and bombs have been thrown, principally in the region of Bagatell, where both sides remain very active.

"Everywhere else the day has been calm and no infantry action has taken place."

"At Les Eparges the German attempted to regain the trenches lost by them on March 27. After a violent struggle the French gains were on the whole maintained in their entirety. The eGrmans obtained a footing in a few sections of their old trenches, but on the other hand the French made progress at other points."

TURKS HAVE ADVANTAGE OF LONG LIVED GUNS

Paris, March 30.—The British and French battle ships engaged in attacking the Turkish forts along the Dardanelles represent two distinct types in construction with respect to the mountings of the heafy guns.

The British battle ships are provided with turrets which enclose the vital parts of the guns—that is to say, the breech mechanism and turning gear. The turrets swing with the guns in the training and sighting of the pieces.

In the case of the French guns the majority of the heavy pieces are mounted on barbette, the armor protection being stationary and the guns swinging over the upper edge of the armored barbette from a turnable within.

The French mounts differ from anything seen in the British service, notwithstanding the British also have recourse to the barbette construction in many of their earlier battle ships.

The French guns, when loaded, are elevated to their highest angle, which places them in line with hydraulic ramm The position of the gun is immaterial, since it can be loaded from any angle of train of the firing platform.

Many of the Krupp guns mounted at the Dardanelles are of the 8.2-inch and 11-inch calibre. Regarding the life of theese guns the Germans assert they will outlive the wise would British pieces. It is recorded that a Krupp 8.2-inch gun of the type in the Turkish works has fired 390 rounds with powder charges varying between moderate and maximum—that is to say, weights between 69.4 pounds and 82.78 pounds. The nitial velocities for these powder charges were, respectively, 2789 and 3083 feet a second.

A second Krupp 8.2-inch gun has fired 508 rounds, it is reported, without any increase in dispersion of flight or reduction in hitting power.

An 11-inch type of Krupp guns used by the Turks has fired 192 rounds with powder charges ranging from 209.4 pounds to 235.9 pounds, yielding, respectively, initial velocities, of 2766 and 2835 feet a second, without untoward consequences. The powder chamber was lengthened 3.5 inches, but the number of rounds was increased to 207 without dertiment to the accuracy of the gun.

ALLIED BATTLESHIPS ARE SHELLING FORTS AT LONG RANGE

London, March 30.—The Russia Black Sea fleet renewed yesterday its attack on the forts at the entrance to the Bosphorus. The results of the bombardment are not known.

Unofficial reports say that a long-distance shelling of the inner defenses has been begun by the battleships.

A dispatch to the Havas Agency from Athens to Paris says that a battleship, torpedo boats, and mine-sweepers of the allied fleet entered the Dardanelles Saturday and Sunday. Kilid Bahr, which was the objective of the guns of the warships, responded feebly. On Sunday afternoon, the correspondent adds, a battleship fired ten shells against the position of Krithia, on the European side a short distance up the strait.

A Reuter dispatch from Constantinople, by way of Amsterdam, says that an imperial tirade has been issued, designating the Turkish forces on the Dardanelles as the fifth army under command of General Liman von Sanders, who was formerly commander of the Turkish forces in Europe.

The absolute clearing of the Turkish ships from the Black Sea has been promptly followed by a close bombardment of the Turkish defenses on the European and Asiatic shores at the mouth of the Bosphorous. News that the sound of Russian cannon echoed thru the streets of Constantinople on Palm Sunday awakened great joy in Russia.

It is known that the Black Sea fleet was recently engaged in vigorous preparatory work. The Asiatic coast had been searched for mine layers and several were sunk, while all the Turkish transports were destroyed or captured.

The Breslau in its flight back to the Bosphorus struck a Turkish mine near the coast and was disabled beyond repair. The Hamidieh was the last fighting ship to venture into the open sea.

It is officially announced that the Russian warships at dawn yesterday began shelling forts spread over a distance of four or five miles on each side of the Bosphorus, aviators registering the effect of the fire and the disposition of the Turkish batteries.

A few torpedo boats attempted to emerge into the sea, but they were quickly driven beyond range into the channel. Russian shells, it is said, dropped excellently over a wide radius, causing much destruction. The bombardment will continue.

LONDON SAYS BRAND OF INFANCY IS FIXED

London, March 30.—In club, in cafe, in official circles nothing is heard but the deepest denunciation of Germany's infamy in the part which one of her submarines played in the sinking of the two English steamers and the consequent loss of nearly 150 passengers. The Morning Post of today says:

"Germany has boasted that the opinion of the civilized world does not interest her and certainly will not deflect her from her appointed course, and now we have evidence which not even our most incorrigible sentimentalists can ignort that she means what she says. To vent her hatred of this country there is no barbarity from which she will shrrink, not even the shelling of women passengers as they seeek refuge in the boats of a sinking ship. Very well, we must henceforth reckon with that fact.

"While Germany thus fixes the brand of infamy on her name it is our business first of all to take all measures for thwarting this reckless savagery, and next to make it plain that a dear account will be inexorably exacted for these crimes. It is true that the conscience of this country would never allow us to take reprisals in kind, whatever Germany does in the way of murder and outrage. We could not stoop to the lex talionis, but that does not mean that we are to suffer these things passively, that we are to let bygones be bygones when the time to exact the settlements shall arrive, and extend to the criminals an act of general oblivion and forgiveness. To consent to such counsel would be not only weak but treachery to civilization and humanity.

"It has become a vital world interest that the spirit which has made these deeds of horror possible shall not be only humiliated but utterly broken, and that the people who have fostered that spirit should be made to regret in bitterness and sorrow. It is our bounden duty to posterity not less than to the present generation to see to it that in its ending the way of the transgressor shall be hard."

Opinions

Socialism In Action

Australia is a state which governs itself along socialistic lines probably more than any other country, and as time goes on the government takes on more arctivities. This is not to argue that what Australia does should be adopted in the United States, but is merely to point out the fact.

The price of meat has been going up in Australia. It was the theory of some people that higher wages granted by the wages board was the cause. The government investigated and decided that the development of the cold storage and export business was at the bottom of the difficulty. The government, therefore, proposes to control the whole goods supplies of Sidney—much after the fashion of Germany in the war. The scheme would include state-controlled abattoirs and suburban meat depots. At the same time the government will begin buying sheep and selling them direct in order to eliminate middlemen. Later, it proposes to do the same with beef. It has purchased three trawlers in England, which are on the way, and has started the construction of 30 in order to provide a cheaper supply of fish for the people. Provision is also to be made for a swifter transportation of fruit and vegetables from the irrigated area to the city. The government has already started a market garden near town, and prison labor is being tested in working it. The state minister is also considering the establishment of a state bread trust operated in the interest of the people, and the estimates are that bread would be reduced in price two cents per loaf.

The Australian government is certainly doing things with the aim to make food cheap. If any one desires to study a Socialistic state in action, Australia and New Zealand are the countries to look to.

No Nation-Wide Primary

Washington dispatches say that Mr. Pomerene, one of the majority members of the Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections, has made an adverse report to President Yilson on the latter's scheme for a nation-wide Presidential primary. The Ohio Senator holds that there is no constitutional authority for a primary of that sort.

It is hard to find any shadow of a warrant for federal control of the preliminary processes through which a President is elected. The Constitution gives Congress the right to regulate the manner in which Senators and Representatives are elected, except so far as concerns fixing the placce of choosing Senators. But it leaves to each state the power "to appoint electors in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct," merely providing that Congress may fix the day on which the electors are to be chosen (the day to be the same throughout the country) and the day on which the electors shall cast their votes. Since the states are left free as to the manner in which they fair construction of the Constitution be left free to follow their own wishes in expressing preferences for Presidential candidates. Evidently a constitutional amendment is needed to nationalize either the process of election or the process of nocination.

Even were the Constitution nat a bar to a federal primary, the experiment would be surrounded with many practical difficulties. Congress would have to prescribe uniform ualifications for voters, create nation-wide election machinerf and guarantee eual treatment for all the states. If one vote should count the same everywhere, the states which have a restricted suerage would exercise far less pomer in the primary college. Suffrage states would have a great advantage over anti-suffrage states. The whole federal system would be stood on its head.

There is no need for so revolutionary an innovation. The game is not worth the candle. Most of the states now use the primary in electing delegates to Presidential conventions, and, so far as popular control of nominations, is concerned, state primaries fit the situation far better than any national primary would. —Press, N. Y.

OUR NEW HIGH SCHOOL

The problem of public recreation in any city is a real problem. No city however small can afford to not face its responsibility. No city is too small to refuse a spot where its people may have healthy, happy creation. Villages in their sleepy innocence are apt to garble in horrified whispers of the evil in the big cities, yet are unconscious of the sore spots in their own midst, which, if revealed to the sunlight, might surprise even the big cities themselves.

When people are happy they are more likely to be good; then if we are to look to the morals of a community we shall seek first to make its people happy. A place where gymnastics may be indulged in, a place where public musicals may be held, a place where the affairs that concern the community may be debated; a place of amusement for all classes to go and enjoy themselves without first paying for their bit of fun.

A school-house should be the social center of a community where such enjoyment may be had. Our city has no school constructed for such a purpose. The new high school should be so planned as to be used to meet the needs of our city. It would be the one great democratic meeting place for its entire people. It could be made to house a gymnasium, club rooms for its boys and girls, reading rooms, club rooms for the women and by the use of removable partitions an entire floor could be transformed into an auditorium.

The idea advanced in the foregoing phrases is by no means new. Various places have tried out the plan and are now enjoying the fruits of their labor.

The time to build the new high school is now—today. Let us not forget that before anything is real it is first in the thought of some one. Let the ideal high school be created in thought today, that when the plot is chosen the school may at least be half built. Plan it now.

AN EXAMPLE FOR NEW JERSEY

Disquieting as the outbreak of smallpox in New Jersey undoubtedly is, there is small reason to fear that it is beyond the power of the state board of health to hold it in check. Nor is there any cause for apprehension on the score of timidity among those in authority. It is true that the opponents of national preventive methods are at least as well organized and as active in that state as in any other, and we many count, of course, upon the usual outcry of protest against the order for vaccination issued by the Millville Board of Health, as against several other precautionary measures adopted elsewhere. It is evident, however, that there is a widespread consciousness of the gravity of the situation, and it is only to be hoped that there will be no disposition among any who are responsible for the health of the public to humor even in the least particular the whims of a small but mischievous minority.

The consequences of giving in weakly to stupid prejudice and ignorance were shown clearly enough not long since in Niagara Falls. It was nly by adopting the most drastic measures that the intolerable conditions prevailing there were at last remedied, conditions for which there was never any real excuse. For a year and more the disease allowed to spread, until Niagara Falls came to be the worst center of smallpox in the country, all because the local health officers either were afraid to oppose popular sentiment or because they themselves fell in with the stream and became converts to the preposterous teaching of a tireless and tiresome fanatic who had been suffered for years to amuse himself by distributing tracts everywhere, airing all his favorite hobbies, from anti-smoking to anti-vaccination.

When Dr. Biggs came to power he put a stop to this nonsense by establishing rigid regulations governing the conduct of factories and places of public assembly. In a very little while the outbreak was well in hand. No doubt the rules he enforced were trying to many, but the point is that if reasonable precautions had been taken in the beginning there never would have been any occasion for drastic measures. The regulations adopted in New Jersey seem to be reasonable, and now the one thing to be desired is that they be duly enforced.—Tribune, N. Y.

ALBANY LETTER DAY BY DAY

By FREDERIC T. CARDOZE

Albany, March 30.—As the date for the convening of the Constitutional Convention draws bear there are heard numerous plans which some of the delegates would like to see carried out as the result of the effort to so amend the State Constitution that beeter results be achieved in more than one branch of government.

That considerable time is to be devoted to the legislature and the courts is known. The uestion as to whether it would be a wise departure to prescribe a four year term of office for the governor and the members of the senate and a two year term for members of assembly is very likely to be one of the first propositions to be taken up for discussion.

Bi-ennial sessions of the legislature is also to be advocated, although several of the members of the present law-making body, including Majority Leader Harold J. Hinman is on record as favoring a year round session. It is estimated that as the result of bi-ennial sessions the State will save at least two hundred and fifty dollars a day.

It has been forecasted that a strenuous attempt will be made to have the State re-districted so that the legislative representation in Greater New York may be increased. Residents of the metropolis have long maintained that they have been inadeuately represented in the legislature and it is understood that they will not lose the opportunity which will be afforded by the Constitutional Convention,to present their claims for a readjustment of the senate and assembly districts.

It is pointed out that at the pres- York city represents on an average, 154,182 constituents, while each up-State senator represents but 120,741 Assemblymen from the metropolis representuents to the number of 51,394, while members of the lower house from up the state, represent but 41,635.

It is declared by advocates of the re-districting plan that ih Articele Three, section Three of the State Constitution of 1894, departure was made for the first time in the history of the State from popular representation and that the election of legislators was subjected to certain geographical divisions, irrespective of the number of people residing in such units. The increase in the population in the larger cities, particularly New York, has, it is asserted, increased the enormity of this offense against the principle of proportionate representation. The York legislators say that under the present system, the greater the increase in population in their city, the less legislative representation it has from a proportionate standpoint.

The above argument is presented by the Democrats who go a step further and declare that the system now in vogue tends to strengthen the Republican organization, since the city of New York is largely Democratic in politics. They argue that the population of the metropolis is constantly growing larger but notwithstanding that fact New York city sends no additional members to keep abreast of the growth in population.

Republican legislators do not agree with this argument. They figure that the city of New York has a sufficient representation and seem to fear that if additional members were provided for by the amended Constitution, that Greater New York would be in a position to practically control legislation, provided the additional senators and assemblymen numbered a score or so.

WHEN IT'S O'ER

BY
FULTON
N. Y.

When it's o'er; this glorious Easter; don't you doubt we'll have a feaster; don't you doubt we'll have our day. Then we'll raze the ice cream shop. Then we'll toss the lolly-pop. Lent is over—hip! hip! hurrah!! Men and women, boys and girls, dress your gayest, wear your pearls, and wear your choicest bells upon your toes, on your finger place your ring. Whoop her up and make her bing. Eat and drink and merry be, the old song goes. Shout and sing, and swell with laughter; think not of the morning after; quite sufficient is the evil of that day. Think your tears and wear a smile, and be happy all the while; or find yourself by using an X-ray. Be a sport and not a kicker; strike a light and let it flicker. To be in swing you can't be something that is slow. Don't you think good fun is jolly, and our right? I do, by golly; so we'll string her up and then we'll let her go. Of course there always are a few who celebrate until they're blue, who toss the dough, until they cannot see; they feel they cannot girt their dome, and ope' the door of home, they find they had a problematic key.

CONGRESSIONAL "MACE" TO UNDERGO REPAIRS

The mace, historic symbol of authority of the sergeant-at-arms of the House of Representatives, is about to undergo repairs and much ceremony will attend the repairing. There are many persons, perahps, who do not know there exists such a thing as the mace—and yet for nearly three-quarters of a century the mace has always been standing in its place to the left of the Speaker whenever the House has been in session.

One day last session, the assistant sergeant-at-arms assigned to see that the mace is always in its place, forgot to bring in that symbol as the House conveyed and he sprinted unceremoniously through the corridors when he realized the oversight, getting the mace in its place about one minute late.

The mace consists of a silver eagle, about the size of one's hand, fastened atop a silver globe, about six inches in diameter, which represents the world. The globe and the eagle top off an ivory pole, silver laid, about four feet in length, and this pole sits in a socket of stone, the stone pillar remaining near the Speaker's desk from session to session.

As soon as the gavel falls, announcing the convening of the House of Representatives, the deputy sergeant-at-arms solemnly arises and puts the mace on the pedestal. There it remains so long as the House proper is in session, but the mace is taken down whenever the House goes into "committee of the whole," to debate bills before they are put on final passage. Whenever the Speaker is on the job, however, the mace is there in all its imposing dignity.

The mace now in use was made in 1841 by William Adams of New York city. It probably will be taken back to the Adams repair shop, still in existence, for repairs. There is nothing in particular wrong with the mace, except that the end of the ivory pole has become slightly out of joint, which causes the amce, familiarly called "the bird," to wabble whenever it is put in its socket.

Members of Congress have been accustomed to see the mace standing straight up year after year. A wobbly mace also worries the sergeant-at-arms, Bob Gordon, and he is now planning to send the mace out of town, under heavy guard to have it fixed.

Several years ago, when the beak of the silver eagle had a slight mishap, two deputies from Gordon's office guarded the mace for more than a day, while it was being given attention at a local jeweler's.

There is no use for the mace in the House except that it representss law and order. If a member of the lower branch of Congress becomes unruly, the Speaker orders the sergeant-at-arms to make that member take his seat. Bearing the mace in front of him. The police officer of the House marches solemnly down the aisles, presents the mace to the offending member and if that individual does not immediately sit down and cease the disturbance, he may be arrested and brought before the bar of the House for reprimand or such punishment as that body sees fit to impose.

Only a most daring and angry member, however, would resist the sergeant-at-arms as he bears down with the mace in his hands. It is the final thing in authority, representing the dignity of the House of Representatives, just as a policeman's badge or a constable's star gives those officers of the law a right arrest in the name of the law.

It is seldom that the mace had to be pulled down from its pedestal and presented to an angry member. A whole session of Congress may go by without calling for the use of the mace, and then again the debate may grow so hot that it will be called for twice within a day. About six years ago, "Uncle Joe" Cannon, then Speaker of the House, sternly demanded the sergeant-at-arms to quell Congressman John Wesley Gaines of Tennessee, who was loudly dmanding recognition and refused to take his seat when "Uncle Joe" would not accord him the privilege of being heard.

Amid much confusion, the sergeant-at-arms jerked down the mace, hurried to where Gaines was standing and shook the eagle at him vigorously. John Wesley sat down, although he continued to mutter against "Uncle Joe."

When Private John Allen of Mississippi was a member of the House, the mace was once brought into play to make him take his seat. The report in the sergeant-at-arms office is that Private John shouted:

"Don't you peck me with the d—— bird." He sat down, however, and that is what the mace went after.

After repairs, the mace will again be on hand for the Sixty-fourth Congress. Members come and go and "lame ducks" hobble off to oblivion, but the silver eagle on the mace is with the House forever—at least, it has been since the forties.

PASSOVER BEGAN LAST NIGHT AT SUNDOWN

Passover began yesterday at sundown. The feast will continue for the reformed Jews seven days and for the orthodox Israelites eight days. This festival, which commemorates the deliverance of the chosen people from Egypt, is widely observed by the Jews all over the land. In the large cities special services are held every evening this week.

More than in any previous year an effort has been made to permit Jews in all walks of life to observe the anniversary according to the Mosaic law.

The humane side of Thomas Mott Osborne was again mainfested last night at Sing Sing, where the Passover was celebrated for the first time by the Jewish prisoners. The observance was arranged by Mr. Osborne, warden. A Seder was arranged and a Rabbi officiated. A Hebrew actdor's club presented a Yiddish play.

MOTORING UNDER HEAVY DIFFICULTIES IN ARIZONA

What is declared to be the most strenuous hill-climbing feat ever performed by a motor car in the southwest is a trip made by an Overland Model 81 touring car to the "Hole-in-the Rock," near Phoenix, Arizona.

In lieu of a road up the steep cliff, the car was forced to push its way up an incline of 30 per cent over a loose gravel trail. There were two bad turns with the path on the bare face of the cliff. This necessitated slowing down to a speed little faster than walk, eliminating any advantage which might have been gained from a flying start. Consequently the car was forced to make the climb entirely on its own pulling power.

The "Hole-in-the-Rock" has always been said to be inaccessible for vehicles. So far as is known, the Overland is the only motor car which ever successfully negotiated the climb.

A remarkable feature of the feat is that the car was equipped with smooth tread tires and no chains were used.

BUSINESS MEN ON PROTECTION

BUSINESS AFFECTED BY TARIFF REDUCTIONS

Chairman John A. Topping of the Republic Iron and Steel Company directors, commenting upon the sunsatisfactory condition of the iron and steel business last July, said: "The earnings of the company for the six months' period ending June 30, 1914, emphasize the general effect of business resulting from tariff reductions and trade hesitation, incident to the enacting of new laws and the discussion of radical legislation."

CANNOT SURVIVE WITHOUT PROTECTION

Mr. Irwin F. Lehman, treasurer of the Knox Pressed and Welded Steel Co., of Pittsburgh, recently said: "It has been proven without a shadow of a doubt, that the steel industry cannot survive without protection. Until we can devise means of lowering the cost of living, we will have to protect our manufacturers with a tariff."

ENTIRE BLAME ON UNDERWOOD TARIFF

The Royal Weaving Company of Pawtucket, R. I., states: Business is the worst that we have experienced since 1895, when we had the Wilson tariff bill. Today we are having 1,074 looms stopped and 963 looms running, and we have to stop more looms from day to day. There is no business in sight as far as we can see. If it was not for the present war in Europe our American markets would be flooded with merchandise made in England, Germany, Austria and Italy, and we would have no chance whatever under the present tariff bill to compete.

DUE TO "NEAR FREE-TRADE" POLICY

Dake Engine Company, Grand Haven, Mich.: Cause of dullness in American Markets—this we attribute to the "near Free-Trade" policy instituted by our present Democratic Administration —We fail to see how it is possible for this country to increase its importations of merchandise and agricultural products without displacing from our home market an equal amount of home-made merchandise and home-grown agricultural products. And the amount of importations might have been doubled had it not been for the war in Europe. This "near Free-Trade" policy never will work in this country. It has shaken the confidence of American capital, has wrought injury upon the American manufacturers, workman and agriculturist; and the sooner we get back to the "Protective Tariff" policy the better, when confidence, which is the backbone of business, will be restored."—Home Market Club.

TARIIFF MORE THAN ANY ONE THING

S. G. Stafford, Inc. (Inks), of New York: "While we feel that the war is partly accountable, the program of Democratic legislation, we believe, has had far more to do with the dullness, which was almost as pronounced before the war, in so far as our line is concerned, as it has been since. The tariff has probably had more to do with poor business than any other one thing."

NEW P.E. CHURCH ON OLD SITE

First Street Will be Beautified by Building That Will Cost About $40,000

A vigorous financial campaign will be inaugurated immediately by the members of the Zion Episcopal church for the purpose of raising funds with which to erect a splendid new building on the site of the present church. When interview today regarding the new church, the pastor, Rev. M. J. Peters, said that work may be started early in May.

The church will be built of native stone and will be of a cruciform design in the Gothic type of architecture. The church will seat three hundred and fifty persons and the interior will be tastefully decorated. A new pipe organ will be installed in place of the organ now in use. Another feature which should particularly appeal to the parishioners will be the erection of a modern parish house in the rear of the church. The parish house idea has proven itself a success wherever it has been given a trial and in addition to being the meeting place for the various clubs and societies of the church it has other functions. The young people make the parish house their social center and in many churches it is used for the amateur theatricals and entertainments of the various clubs. The Zion parish house will embody every modern idea including a stage, diningroom and library and with the new church will add to the attractiveness and beauty of First st.

Funds for the work will be raised entirely by subscription. The cost of the church will be approximately $40,000.

Special services will be held in the church during this week. Tonight the Rev. Dr. Coddington of Syracuse will preach on a subject connected with the last week of Christ's life.

PI KAPPA'S WILL MEET ON THURSDAY EVENING

The PiKappa Delta club will hold its next regular meeting at the home of Miss Hazel Danton in Phillips st. Plans for several social evenings during the coming spring will be discussed. Thursday, April 15th, the club will meet at the home of Miss Zetta Babcock in Park st.

STORM SEWER CONTRACT TO BE AWARDED

Last night the Board of Public Works met at the rooms of the water department in the City Hall. Commissioners John W. Stevenson, L. E. Garrett and A. W. Wiltsie being present.

The Board took up the matter of constructing a new storm sewer, made necessary by the filling in of the old canal, with Harvey Wise representing the re-organized Hunter Arms Co. The Hunter Arms Co., in view of granting the city certain rights across their property has asked the city to share all liability should judgment be obtained in a suit over damages that might ensue thru the joint use of the Hunter Arms tail race.

After thorough discussion of all the points in this matter between the board and Mr. Wise it was finally referred to the city attorney who was directed to draft an agreement for submittion to the Hunter Arms Co. this afternoon and, if an agreement is reached, the board will meet again tonight for the purpose of awarding the contract for the construction of the sewer in question.

Bids were submitted for this work by Frank Massarro and Tony De Barber. The Massaro bid totaled $2445.60, while the DeBarber bid amounted to $3545.97. This contract will be awarded immediately upon the city and the Hunter Arms Co. reaching a mutual understanding in the matter.

DEPARTMENT MADE LONG, QUICK RUN TO FIRE

Chief Waugh and his men were called fro mtheir comfortable quarters this morning at 2.20 o'clock by a still alarm from the home of William Cook, of West Broadway. The snow storm was at its height at the time and the sixty-mile gale made the long run one of the worst the local department has taken this winter. Fortunately for the firemen the fire was only a blaze in the rear of the kitchen stove and was under control in a very short time.

Mr. Cook was awakened about two o'clock by the smell of smoke and, discovering the blaze in the lower part of the house, telephoned the department. An extinguisher soon killed the flames. The loss was small and it is believed the house is insured.

McKINSTRY'S BIG SALE NOW IN FULL BLAST

Manager Frank Elliott of the McKinstry store has decided to hold a clearance sale and every article in the establishment will be disposed of. BAND STAND BLOWS DOWN

Gale Completed Work Begun by City Workmen.

One of Fulton's oldest landmarks is no more. This morning residents along the edge of City Park were surprised upon looking out of their windows to see pieces of wreckage lying around the park and closer investigation revealed the fact that the bandstand, which has stood for many years in the center of the park, was completely demolished. The sweeping gale of last night had done the deed.

Inasmuch as work had been begun on tearing down the stand, the wind simply saved the city some money, but there are many who will note the absence of the familiar structure.

J. A. Morrill, said this morning that a new stand may be erected this summer but that the archiecture of the new stand had not yet been decided upon.

GREAT BARGAINS IN PIANOS AT BOGUE'S MUSIC HOUSE, 61 1st ST. adv.

ROUND ABOUT

The Unionist journals in London are attacking Premier Asquith for an alleged lack of vigor in his direction of the war.

Protestant missionary societies of the United States estimate that of the $11,000,000 needed immediately for closing their fiscal year,there will be a shortage of $2,000,000. They regard this as better than they had been expecting since the war began. French and German workers in Asia have had no aid from their homes, and American funds have been turned over tothem by American missionaries. The Presbyterian societies face the prospect of entering the year with a deficit of about $200,000, the Congregationalists about $10,000 and the Baptists $10,000.

Wearing a placard on which was her name, destination and 15 cents in parcel post stamps, 6-year old Edna Neff passed through the terminal station at Savannah, Ga., recently on her way from Pensacola, Fla., to Christiansburg, Va. She weighs just under the 50-pound limit. Edna lived in Pensacola with her mother,who has been separated from her husband, the child's father, for some time. The probation officer in Pensacola offered to send the child back to Virginia, and the mother made no objection. The officer had no funds with which to pay the fare of a grown-up traveling companion for the child, so he did the next best thing, which was to intrust her to the parcel post.

Commenting on the reception given Elihu Root by the New York Lawyer's Association on March 13, Bench and Bar says: "Perhaps the most interesting feature of this tremendous ovation was the unanimity with which it was proclaimed that Mr. Root returns to take his place, not as a mere member of the bar, but as the acknowledged leader of the New York Bar. * * * Of course, so long as Joseph Choate is spared us—and may it be many years— he will occupy first place in the affections and the admiration of our bar; but he has already, to use his own expression, 'lived 12 years beyond the span of life alloted by the benighted Psalmist, and he has now laid aside the active leadership. If is this mantle that will now be worn by a worthy successor in the person of Elihu Root."

As the result of the efforts of American Ambassador Page instructions have been received in Genoa from the Foreign Ministry at Rome to allow all American cotton billed through Italy to be exported. The difficulties in the way of moving the commodity now are due to congestion. At the present time there are 158 ships inside the harbor of Genoa waiting to unload their cargoes, while outside the harbor 116 vessels are waiting to enter.

The constitutionalist convention, which has a Republican majority, after convening in Albany on April 6 and electing officers, will probably adjourn for two or three weeks. By that time it is expected that the Legislature will have finished its labors and that the convention will start in on what will undoubtedly be an all summer task. One of the most important subjects to be taken up by the convention will be the short ballot. under which it is proposed that the Governor, Lieutenant Governor, Controller and Attorney General be the only State officers elected by the people. The others are all to be appointed by the Governor. Other questions include the propositions to increase the pay of legislators from $1.500 to $2.500 a year and the terms of Senators from two to four years and of Assemblymen from one to two years. Senator Brackett will propose the reduction of the number of Senators and Assemblymen. One proposition that will be discussed is whether the Governor should sit in the Legislature. Conservation, reorganization of the judiciary and the establishment of greater home rule for cities and the granting to New York City of larger representation in the Legislature will also come up for discussion.

Although Elmer P. Howes of Lake Oscawanna, N. Y., was struck by an automobile in Putnam Valley Sunday and had three ribs broken, a glass lamp globe he carried was not even cracked.

Cheer up! All you have to do is to live a hundred years to get letters from the President of the United States and the Governor of the State congratulating you on your success in demonstrating that Dr. Osler did not know what he was talking about when he fixed 40 years as the limit.

Margaret Wilson, the President's daughter, has sung "The Star Spangled Banner" for graphaphone use. All of the royalties realized from the record will go to the International Relief Society for the aid of the war-stricken cities of Europe.

YACHTSMAN GOT CHILLY BATH

Bernard McCann Fell Into Mill Race While Trying to Move Boat

Yesterday afternoon Bernard McCann, millwright of the Granby Pulp and Paper Co., nearly lost his life by drowning. While working about the water wheels he noticed the flow of water was not steady, now coming fast and then slow, apparently beiny stopped as if one of the head gates had been closed. Thinking that drift wood might have gotten into one of the gates he secured a long pike pole and started toward the head gate wall. Upon mounting the wall he saw a twelve foot flat bottom boat had parted its moorings along the west shore and had drifted down with the rushing current until it reached the head yate. It almost covered three of the openings, thus preventing a free flow of water down to the water wheels.

McCann knowing well the power of the current against the head gates attempted to pole the skiff slowly to one side, but it was difficult work as the rushing stream seemed to grow stronger and finally wedged the boat firmly so that it could not be moved. McCann leaned far out and hooked his pike on the gunwhale of the skiff and attempted to force it away from the wall by rocking it. Without warning the boat became loosened, rocked suddenly and caused McCann to loose his foothold and plunge head first into twenty feet of swiftly moving moving water. When he came to the surface of the icy water he shouted for help and in a minute several willing hands were there to aid him. Fred Schultz, a fellow member of the Fulton Yacht Club, succeeded in finding another long pike pole which he let down to the struggling millwright. McCann fearing to let go the gates clung with all his strength, for every now and then the rush of the current would draw him lower and lower.

McCann durin gall this time remained calm and clear headed. Being a yachtsman he knew the tricks of the current and finally, wth one supreme effort he lifted himself almost clear of the water and grasped the pike pole Shultz held down to him. Then came a struggle between the current drawing him down and Shultz with two others drawing him up. After twenty minutes McCann was landed on the gate wall nearly frozen and almost exhausted thru struggling. He was carried to the boiler room where he received "second aid."

After an hour's rest he started for home feeling a bit weak, but thankful for his escape. The men around the mill say that if McCann had not been a yachtsman and familiar with the peculiarities of the current he would not have had a chance for his life. McCann ownes the motorboat Mary which carried off the 1st prize in the Yacht Club regatta on July 4th.

A CIRCUS MINUS PINK DRINKS AND PEANUTS

Patrons of The Quirk were entertained last night by an unusual novelty—a regulation three-ring circus in the middle of the winer. Of course the three rings were not in evidence at all times but all the various acts that combine to make up the well know "Big Shows" were staged.

The features were Millie Evans and her wild animal act, the dog and pony circus and a youthful gymnast who performed some clever feats on a trapeze. Miss Evans, to all appearances a miss of some twenty summers, appeared in a cage, erected on the stage, in the midst of three lions, one grizzly bear, a leopard and a panther. She put her proteges thru some very difficult feats and was, in all respects the hit of the show.

The dog and pony act was a source of great amusement to the younger generation and the act was very meritorious. The gymnast's performance was short but in his allotted time he showed himself a veteran of the sawdust ring.

Although future attractions for the balance of the season have not been booked thus far as many of the road shows are nearing the end of their routs, Manager Darleigh has promised that several New York successes will be seen here before the end of the season.

DONOVAN'S HOPEFULS WON IN NINTH INNING

Doytana, Fla.—"Won in the ninth" was staged here yesterday afternoon in the game between the Yankees and the Suprbas. The Manhattan battery, aided and abetted by the outfielder, Zimmerman, who made a mess of Pieh's hit, enabled Sweeney to score the winning run. The score was, New York American, 3; Brooklyn, 2.

"Cy" Pieh, for the Yankees, outpitched any of the quarete of twirlers. He relieved Caldwell in the sixth inning. In this inning he issued free transportation to thre of the Superbas, but managed to keep them from scoring. Not a hit was made off him. Appleton, for the Superbas, also gave a good account of himself on ther ubber.

NEW QUARANTINE PLACED ON SECTION OF STATE ROAD

State and Federal officials who are working in an effort to stamp out the hoof and mouth disease in this section of the State, placed a quarantine on a section of the state road yesterday afternoon, when a new case of farm of H. L. Clement, one mile south of Central Square.

The cattle on Mr. Clement's farm wered riven along the side of the road and the veterinarians received reports that the animals were infected. The officials were afraid the germs had been blown on the highway and as a precaution they quarantined the road.

After the quarantine had been placed on the road a deputy sheriff was placed in charge and nothing was allowed to move over the restricted area. It is the first time that an order of this kind has been placed since the officials began work in this section, but Dr. B. F. Wende, chief Federal veterinarian, said last night that frequently he is forced to place an embargo on a section of a road.

There are eleven cows, eight yearlings and four calves, in the herd on the Clement farm and all were killed this afternoon. The discovery of the disease was made at 2 o'clock yesterday afternoon.

The officials worked all day yesterday disinfecting the farms where the blight has peen discovered. Dr. Wende said that provided no new cases are found, he expects the work of disinfection will be finished by Saturday.

About Sports Generally

By Frank G. Menke

Havana, March 29.—The fight for the championship of the world between Jack Johnso nand Jess Willard has been postponed until Monday, April 5. President Menocal of Cuba objected to the staging of the combat on Easter Sunday and rather than clash with the authorities, the promoters put over the date 24 hours. The men will enter the ring at noon on April 5.

President Menocal in his letter to the promoters stated that the Cubans did not want the solemnity of the Easter Sunday broken b ythe staging of the fight.

Jess Willard is confident that he will become champion of the world on Easter Monday. The big cowboy declared today that he would bring back the heavyweight crown to the white race and he made his declaration without belittleing the fighting abilities of Jack Johnson. In fact he praised the "Big Smoke," says he was a wonderful fighter but he knows he is a better one.

Willard is in superb condition, he could enter the ring at a moment's notice. There is no superfluous flesh on the big challenger, he is showing increased speed in all his sparring bouts and the only thing that he will develop from now on is his defensive. This looks to be the weak spot in the cowboy's fighting abilities. His sparring partners seem to have little difficulty in breaking through Willard's guard and send in many a telling blow on the jaw, nose and ear.

Willard boxes four rounds daily with his sparring partners—Tom Monaghan, Jim Savage and Jack Hemphill. In these exhibitions the big cowboy sends in many a hard punch, showing that he has developed a great right hand swing.

Jack Johnson has eased up a little in his training. The champion is taking no chances of becoming stale. He took two pounds off in yesterday's work-out and stated that he would have little difficulty in getting down to the weight. He will enter the ring with 225 pounds.

The flood of Johnson money has lengthened the odds in favor of the champion and in some quarters as good as 3 to 1 on the champion retaining his title.

The hitch of the referee question has been settled by Jack Welsh of San Francisco accepting the honor of being the third man in the ring, and the promoters breathed a sigh of relief this morning that this trouble has been smoothed over.

Welsh will arrive here April 2 and will call a conference of the principals for the next day to give them their instructions.

HOT LINERS

Byron Bancroft—Johnson, czar of the American League, has a way of getting a punch in what he says from time to time which carries a certain amoupnt of conviction. This aggressive fellow, who deserves high credit for the position which he has hewed out for himself in baseball, would be more convincing if his pugilistic phrases were not so often contradictory. For a man who has made so light of the Federal League and who has predicted so many times the early demise of this disturbing if not warlike faction in the national game, his advicce now, when pursestrings are tight and club exchequers anaemic, does not carry much weight.

* * *

In commenting on the suggestion of Dave Fultz that a board of arbitration be appointed to settle the present baseball strife and referring to the hapless condition of the minor leagues, Ban Johnson says: "I advocate the closing of the parks for at least a year." This may be sound advice, but it is also a confession of weakness or an acknowledgment that this country cannot support so many minor leagues under conditions existing at this time. Ban Johnson is farseeing; no doubt he realizes that some curtailment would mak for greater and wider interest in the leagues of higher classification. He also appreciates the importance of not allowing the Federal League to get full credit for forcing out the smaller fry on the ground of its invasion of what was supposed to be protected territory. This diplomatic move, if intended as such, might have accomplished its purpose if he had not added: "There will be hundreds of ball players on the market within a short time, and who can afford to pay money for them? The minors? They are strapped. The majors? They have from 250 to 300 more than they need."

* * *

Analyzing the statement, it seems reasonable to assume that if the minors are "strapped" it is because of some constitutional weakness and not altogether traceable to the Federal League invasion. It is true that constant bickering and racing to the courts on the slightest provocation have served to disgust many followers of the sport, but, on the whole, the financial instability of some of the minor leag due largely to a lessening of erest from a satfeit, perhaps, of the game. The Feds cannot be blamed for this, and neither can the players. Analyzing further, it seems fair to conclude that if the majors have from 250 to more players than they need, much used phrase of organized baseball, "There's no room for a third major league," has been dented and battered out of all semblance to its original form.

* * *

Dave Fultz is shrewd and, seeing well into the future without the aid of a Lick telescope, has suggested a plan which will not be adopted, but which will be worked out in some form or another before many months have rolled around. The Federal League has some rights on its side, organized baseball to the contrary, notwithstanding, and these rights on in time will be respected. As previously suggested in this column, the Feds are still too well fortified to be starved out, and while some of the methods adopted to strengthen their cause have not been above suspicion, the same can be said of organized baseball, and that old saying which carries some forece must not be forgotten: "Ill's fair in love and war."

THE WARD POLITICIAN

Speaker Says Commission Form of Government Would Abolish the Healer

The ward politicians and ward politics are a menace to the city and can be quickly and easily removed by the adoption of the commission form of government for cities, Seward A. Miller, ex-corporation counsel of Utica, told the Municipal Study Club and the members of the Albany Realty Board at a meeting recently. Mr. Miller was introduced by Rev. Charles S. Hager, pastor of the Congregational church. In applying his subject of "Commission Government" to the particular needs of such a city as Albany, Mr. Miller declared that Albany, like any other of its kind, could get along much better after the elimination of the ward politician and ward politics.

Commission form of government for cities, he said, removes the opportunity now acorded several poorly paid men to work the mischief of their own petty politics and places in the hands of a few competent, well paid men the business administration of the city. City affairs then become business affairs and are taken out of the category of sectional or factional politics. It is possible to hold the few well paid commissioners to account as strictly as a board of directors or stockholders of a business concern hold its managers to account.

HIS BEST CHUM

By EUNICE BLAKE

Johnny Hoxey, aged fourteen, went to bed one night with a splitting headache. The next morning he remained in slumber, and no effort to awaken him availed. He did not seem to be in pain, sleeping tranquilly. He remained asleep week after week, month after month and year after year. He needed very little food, and that was given him by various methods devised by the doctors. He slept seven years in the same room, in which no change was made during that time.

When Johnny went to sleep a little girl thirteen years old was his "best chum," as he called her. They were in the same class in the same school and used to study their lessons together, for Lucy Treadwell lived directly across the street from Johnny, and they had not far to go to reach each other. Lucy grew from childhood to womanhood, seeing almost daily a person of the opposite sex who was in a perpetual slumber.

One day Johnny showed signs of waking. For a week there was hope that he would do so, but those about him had been so often disappointed that they had lost confidence in his recovery. But he did awaken, and when he came to himself he was alone.

He lay for some time, after becoming conscious, with closed eyes, thinking of his sufferings "the night before," as he supposed it was, and feeling much relieved to be out of pain. Then he attempted to turn on his other side. He was surprised to find himself very weak. Lying in bed without using his muscles had taken his strength. While on his back he opened his eyes, still seeing nothing but the ceiling. Hearing a step in the room, he turned so that he could see a young woman sitting beside a window reading. She was unknown to him. When Johnny as a boy had awakened in the morning and did not have to go to school he usually lay in bed reading.

"Is this Saturday?" he asked.

The girl started, and Johnny was astonished at the sound of his voice. The girl rose excitedly, came to his bedside, then ran immediately out of the room. Johnny in his amazement thrashed about and while doing so put his hand to his face. It was covered with hair.

"What in the world"— he began. And, sitting up in bed, he saw in a mirror the reflection of a man. He was dumfounded. He moved, and the reflection moved. After it had followed several of his movements he covered his face with the bedclothes and gave way to a nervous chill.

Hearing persons hurrying into the room, he threw off the clothes. His mother, looking much older than "the night before," ran into the room, followed by the young woman, who had gone out of it, and, taking him in her arms, sobbed:

"My dear boy! Heaven be thanked!"

"What is it, mother?" cried the affrighted John. "Something strange has happened! How big I am! How rough my voice! I seem to have grown to be a man overnight!"

"You have grown to be a man, dear, but not overnight. You went to bed one night when you were a boy and have slept continuously ever since."

There was silence for some time while a realization of this singular announcement was working its way into John's brain. Then he asked a dozen questions so rapidly that his mother found difficulty in answering one before another came forth. Finally he pointed to the girl, who seemed as much affected by his recovery as his mother, and asked who she was.

"She is—was—your best chum, Lucy Treadwell.

"Good gracious," exclaimed John wonderingly, "is that Lucy?"

"Yes, I'm Lucy. I've prayed for your waking ever since your long sleep began."

"She has been here nearly every day since your slumber began," said John's mother.

"And happened to be here when I woke," said John, and he put out both hands to her. "What a woman you've grown to be! How old are you—I mean how old am I?"

"You're twenty-one, and you know that I'm a year younger than you. That makes me twenty. Can you see any trace of your 'best chum' in me?"

"A trace only," replied John. "You were a pretty little girl then; you are a beautiful woman now."

Mrs. Hoxey said she must go and call the doctor at once. John must not get excited and take no action whatever till the doctor had seen him and given directions concerning him.

John obeyed the first injunction, but soon forgot all about the last. His mother had no sooner left the room than he reached for Lucy's hand and drew her to a seat beside him.

"So you have been here constantly since I have been in slumberland. Why did you come so regularly?"

Lucy turned away her head.

"You were my 'best chum,' and you have proved yourself worthy of the name. I don't seem to know whether I'm boy or man. I remember the kiss I gave you yesterday—I mean before I went to sleep. I wonder, should I kiss you now, would it taste the same?"

"I don't know," was the reply, the face still averted.

's worth a thousand of the others," he said.

NO MORE WHISKEY ADS ON UTICA BILLBOARDS

Utica, March 30—Billboards in the city of Utica will not display any whisky advertisements after the first of January, 1916. This ban on the advertising of the liquor manufacturers is part of a plan of the National Poster Advertising Company of the United States and Canada in the movement now going forward to raise the character of billboard advertising.

Notice of the action of the National Poster Advertising Company was given by Jerome B. Carey of the Utica Billposting Company, which is affiliated with the national company, today. Mr. Carey said that the Utica Billposting Company would not make any new contracts for whisky advertisements after the first of May. Because of the fact that there are still contracts which extend well toward the close of 1915, the prohibition measure against the whisky ads cannot be wholly placed in force until the first of next January.

Mr. Carey said that the national association at the semi-annual meeting of the board of directors, of which Mr. Carey's brother, H. L. Carey, manager of the Philadelphia Billposting Company, is a member, held at Palm Beach, Fla., placed a ban upon all whiskey advertising in its efforts to take a determined step in lifting the character of billboard advertising. Practically all of the poster companies in the United States, Canada, Cuba and the Philippine Islands are members of the National Association, so that no whisky advertising will appear on billboards in North America after the first of next January.

In explaining the motives which prompted the national association to take this big step—for whisky manufacturers have been in the past big poster advertisers—Mr. Carey said the billposting association was endeavoring to eliminate all advertising which might be flaunting before the public an article which might prove injurious to the purchaser. Mr. Carey was quite certain that light wines and beer would not be abolished, as they are not considered harmful and public feeling is not so strong against these beverages. Beer and wine, he said, when taken in moderation are not injurious, which was the prevailing opinion in the national association.

This is the most important step ever taken, it is believed, to attempt to uplift billboard advertising and the character of its notices. And the fact the billposters themselves are responsible for so sweeping an order makes the announcement all the more interesting.

Points for Mothers

A Bad Habit Cured.

A delightful experience is told by a teacher that touches upon a child, an imaginative boy of seven, who was ideally polite and obedient to his parents, but who would, in spite of daily admonitions, insist on putting on his shoes and buttoning them every morning before putting on his trousers, which, of course, would not go on over the shoes. This daily blunder rendered him quite miserable as well as his parents. He would cry with shame and disappointment because he missed his breakfast with his father, promising to try to remember, but so regularly forgetting that his parents began to suspect some latent stubbornness if not deceit in the occurrence.

The teacher was a friend of the family and often visited them. On the occasion of one visit the boy's mother asked her whether she should chastise him for this annoying habit. The visitor said she would write to him, which she did, but the letter was in the form of a story of General Bad Habit, who was quartered in his house. The boy was very fond of military displays and stories, and just here she held his interest. She said she was sorry General Bad Habit was there and that she greatly feared her little friend would be reduced to the ranks if he did not make immediate resistance, and she asked him to use her letter as a flag of truce, to be placed in his shoe overnight, informing General Bad Habit that he proposed not only to resist him, but to take away his title, sword and shoulder straps.

The flag of truce was used in the shoe for two or three nights, then placed on the mantel and in less than a week entirely removed, and a letter from the triumphant child informed the teacher that Bad Habit was reduced to the ranks and the little friend was general and master of the situation. What an altogether charming way to help a child to overcome a failing!

About Children's Teeth.

If a child's second set of teeth remain abnormally short and doll-like it is wise to consult a doctor, as it may be because he is not developing properly owing to a lack of bone forming constituents in his food. One should change the diet in such a case and give something containing plenty of lime, such as haricots, lentils and milk; also they should have plenty of hard, well baked bread crusts.

Little heaps of crusts are often left on a child's plate. A child should never be allowed to leave them, for too much soft food is often the cause of the early decay of second teeth as well as of their undeveloped and irregular formation.

Man's teeth were given to him for grinding and chewing, and if they are never used for hard food they soon decay.

Ridged or ribbed teeth are a sure sign of a system overcharged with uric acid. Rheumatism is latent; these ridges are warning signals.

Do you know what these are? They are teeth that appear as though they had a "picot" edging or little sawlike edge to them, and they nearly always mean that the owner is below par. The serrated edge is really the commencement of a decay that will in time cause serious damage to the child's health.

A Mother's Secret of Success.

The well known proverb "Example is better than precept" is only another form of expressing the predominating power of sympathy, for example can have little influence except in so far as a sympathetic feeling in the observer leads him to imitate it. So that "Example is better than precept" means only that sympathy has more influence in the human heart than reasoning.

This principle, so powerful at every period of life, is at its maximum in childhood. The child's thoughts and feelings are spontaneously drawn into harmony with the thoughts and feelings of those around him whom he loves, and this leads naturally to imitation, or reproduction, of their actions.

The great secret of success for a mother in the formation of the character of her children is to make them respect and love her and then simply to be herself what she wishes them to be. Abbott says that to make them respect and love her is to control them by a firm government where control is required and to indulge them almost without limit where indulgence will do no harm. This is true, but we often forget the latter half and wonder at our failures.

Milady's Mirror

Fruit and Vegetables Beautify.

Fruit is indeed the keynote of spring diet which shall help to improve the complexion. Apples, raw and cooked, baked or as sauce; any of the wholesome citrus family, in itself a whole pharmacopoeia of goodness; the lemon, the orange and the grapefruit—these eaten lavishly and freely are indeed health and beauty at any time of the year, as well as the springtime. Then, to augment all of this, such things as spring onions, chives and parsley are helpful, with crisp salads of romaine, endive or escarole, always with plenty of lemon juce and olive oil. These things, not forgetting plenty of water, taken between meals should obviate all necessity for physic. Internal medicines are not as essential as exercise, proper diet, rest, water drinking. All of these, as said above, will help to secure that improved and regenerated complexion so much desired when winter is a thing of the past.

Then it must not be overlooked that a course of facial treatment is well worth its cost and very necessary if such a course is taken in reputable establishments, where knowledge and long experience have resulted in really helpful methods. Personal advice as to proper local as well as constitutional treatment is given, and the patient is sure of benefit from such a course. When later on that pretty [illegible] dainty dress, are donned the wearer shall look into her mirror and have nothing to regret as she scrutinizes her reflection, for her complexion shall be as fresh and as flawless as her costume, and the ensemble will be entirely satisfactory.

Headaches are much more serious in their hidden possibilities than most persons believe, and they work havoc with facial beauty.

Middle ear disease, mucus and pus in the upper part of the nose, mastoid abscesses, fevers of various sorts, brain trouble, distempers such as tuberculosis, joint infections, or gout, eye disorders, tonsilitis, gastric crisis, constipation, dysenteries, pneumonia, and almost the whole roster of human maladies may be preceded or accompanied by headaches.

Further be it remembered that slovenly breathing, overeating, poor ventilation, lack of exercise and an indoor life all have their accompanying headaches.

There are different methods in the treatment of headaches. Each depends upon the source.

Deep breathing and simple rations, sleep in the open air and muscular sport in the open may cure safely, if not quickly.

Charcoal, olive oil, milk of magnesia and fruits eliminate the frontal throbs that come from constipation.

Ice bags, and alkaline mineral water, a short diet with green vegetables may cure the headache of glutoony.

Rational gymnastics, physical culture, graduated exercises in the fresh air and a cold bath may cure the headache due to sleeplessness.

For Brittle Nails.

You can't make your hands look nice if your nails are very brittle, because they always break off and show rough, jagged edges. Brittle nails are often constitutional, or a sign of poor health. You can do a great deal toward curing them in the following way:

Rub some pure cold cream or white vaseline all over the nails and well into the base at night. Once or twice a week apply a little olive oil, and never wash the hands in hard water or put them in strong soda water, for this aggravates the condition. The treatment described is a remedy for hang nails also, for it keeps the skin round the base of the nails pliable and soft.

To Allay Pain of Burns.

Burns on the hands and arms are of frequent occurrence to the housewife. Aside from the pain caused, they do not add to one's charms. In case of a burn at once apply linseed or sweet oil to the parts affected and then thickly cover with baking soda and bind with a soft linen cloth. In ordinary cases of burn this will shortly relieve the pain. Equal parts of limewater and linseed oil applied to the burn several times a day will keep it soft, allay pain and hasten healing.

Woman's World

Pavlowa dances. Surrounded by chattering corypheés, hand on hip, head to one side in a pose of anticipation, she works out a terpsichorean problem. She has succeeded. The group parts, and she steps forth, leading a tall girl in shimmering blue classic dress. Pavlowa reiterates the steps, the music breathing soft accompaniment. The girl imitates. Over and over the steps they work, Pavlowa snapping her slender fingers, tossing her head, forcing into the figure the spirit which makes great dancing. And when the coryphee succeeds an approving pat on the shoulder rewards the radiant girl.

In rehearsal when the music is a bit uncertain, when the lights are blatant, when the vast orchestra and the vaguer balconies beyond are chilling in the unresponsive mustiness, the joy of Pavlowa's dancing is as apparent as when she dances to crowded auditoriums. She colors the ballet, the director and the strangely gentle conductor of the orchestra. The final twirl is not coincident with the final chord. She steps out of the musical picture and shakes her head at the conductor. "Last four bars," orders Mr. Theodore Stier, and again the final twirl, still out of beat. Over and over she does that difficult twirl, the ballet does its intricate tableau and the orchestra its tempestuous finale. All watch her. She snaps her fingers. "One, two, three, four," marks time with her arms and smiles because it is art to achieve the difficult.

"She is the hardest working woman in the world," her agents, her directors and the rest of her adorers declare fervently. And to watch her and talk with her during an hour confirms the extravagant statement.

Far more than merely the director and teacher of these girls, she is their mother, speaking of them as "my children." They live with her. She sees to it that their other studies are not neglected. She watches them; will not allow them to go to parties or go out at night. Their street clothes are as quiet and unexaggerated as her own are. Never do they wear silk stockings on the street, for, besides being very bad for the feet, they are extravagant, and children must be taught not to be improvident.

And most important is their work. But that she teaches them less by word than by example, for they cannot fail to imitate the ardor with which she pursues her art all day and every day, to the exclusion of every other pleasure.

CHIC EASTER CREATION.

Coquettish Little Hat of White Straw For the Small Girl.

SPRING CHAPEAU.

To Keep Silver Bright.

An easy way to keep silver bright is to put a handful of borax in a dishpan of hot water with a very little soap. Put the silver in this and let it stand the entire morning. Then rinse in clear water and wipe thoroughly dry with a soft cloth.

You can treat plated ware in the same manner without the slightest injury to the plate.

Regular applications of equal parts of lemon juice and glycerin after washing do wonders in whitening the skin and preventing the formation of discoloration marks upon the neck from the constant wearing of furs. The glycerin helps to keep the skin pleasingly soft, also preventing it from getting that harsh, dry, shriveled up appearance which is so conducive to the formation of wrinkles on face and neck.

THE MOVING SPIRIT.

To the locomotive more than to anything else may be attributed the spirit that has made town development possible. It is perfectly easy now for civic secretaries to assemble anywhere, perhaps a thousand miles away from home. A day and a night behind the steam monster and the man from Boston grasps the hand of the secretary from Cape Girardeau; North Dakota and South Carolina compare notes; Utah and Maryland swap experiences; Kansas and New Jersey are brothers.

So with all business and commerce. Without the locomotive Chicago today would be a small town, Atlanta a village, Denver a hamlet. Development, dependent as it is upon rail traffic, would have been impossible. The community bordering on no navigable waterway would have been stalled.—Town Development Magazine.

JUNIOR POLICE FORCE.

An Organization of Boys Has Been Started in New York City.

A junior police force has been recently started on the east side in New York city. The department is organized on the model of the regular police force and governed by a written code of regulations. The precinct has been divided into twelve districts, with a captain over each. Each captain has a lieutenant, two sergeants, and from twenty-one to sixty-five patrolmen, whose duty is summed up in the ten sentences following:

Prevent swearing in public streets and places.

Prevent the building of bonfires on the streets.

Prevent boys from engaging in dangerous or unlawful play.

Prevent boys from playing craps or smoking cigarettes.

See that ash and garbage cans are removed after being emptied.

Prevent the mixing of paper, garbage and ashes.

In order to prevent these duties from interfering with their play hours each boy is "on" only a half hour each day. During this time he inspects the blocks assigned to him and reports their condition to his superior. The work is said to be effective and appeals to the boys immensely.

REEL FAVORITES OFF THE FILM

Billie Rhodes' latest addition to her extensive wardrobe is a novel gown. Every feature is distinctly new, from the lace tunic to the clever draping. Billie certainly knows how to dress. In "Nellie, the Pride of the Fire House," and in "Taking Her Measure" she is gowned most becomingly.

Exceptionally clever photography is shown in the photo play, "Broncho Billy's Vengeance," in which the vision of his dead wife appears to G. M. Anderson, who takes the role of Broncho Billy. The vision comes just as he is about to brand a gambler who stole with the children and then neglected her. She came to beg him not to injure the latter. Broncho is overwhelmed and lets the man escape.

"The Girl of the Music Hall" is without doubt the most absorbing production in which Alice Joyce, who enacts the title role, has ever appeared. It tells the story of a girl who surmounts the tremendous obstacles which confront her and wins success and fame.

Riverside, Ill., a suburb of Chicago, has established what is probably the first municipally owned picture theater in the United States. The theater will be owned and operated entirely in the public interest.

Richard C. Travers' powerful build and athletic training stand him in good stead in taking a scene in the photo play, "The Conflict," when he has to lift Sydney Ainsworth, who weighs nearly 200 pounds, from the ground and swing him on horseback. This is done while Ainsworth is supposedly unconscious.

"The Police Dog," an animated cartoon comedy, by C. T. Anderson, shows Officer Piffle of the "white lights" squad seeking relaxation from his labors by taking a plunge in the harbor. A hungry shark, on the lookout for eats, makes a play for the cop, and the shark and Officer Piffle fight it out to a finish. The shark is glad to get rid of his tormentor, who looks in vain for his trousers. Piffle substitutes a barrel for his missing garment. The barrel is a tight fit, which fact is noted by Billy Goat, who, with a well directed butt, sends Piffle rolling toward the station house, where he finally lands on top of the capella.

W. C. Cabanne has produced a one reel heart interest drama called "The Better Way," in which Dorothy Gish as a young servant girl keeps up a brave struggle to hold her father, an ex-convict, played by F. A. Turner, in the straight and narrow path.

An "Inquirer" Asks for Information. He Wants to Know Whether at the Recent Conference of the Mayor, the City Attorney and Tax Board, There Was Made a Parallel Proposition.

Clean Up Campaign

People of Fulton, do we need a "clean-up" campaign this spring? All in favor say "Aye," then write it down along with youd ideas of what such a campaign should accomplish and send it to the The Evening Times. All suggestions will be published in next Saturday's issue. Do it now. Don't think your opinion won't help. Write It Down—for a City Beautiful.

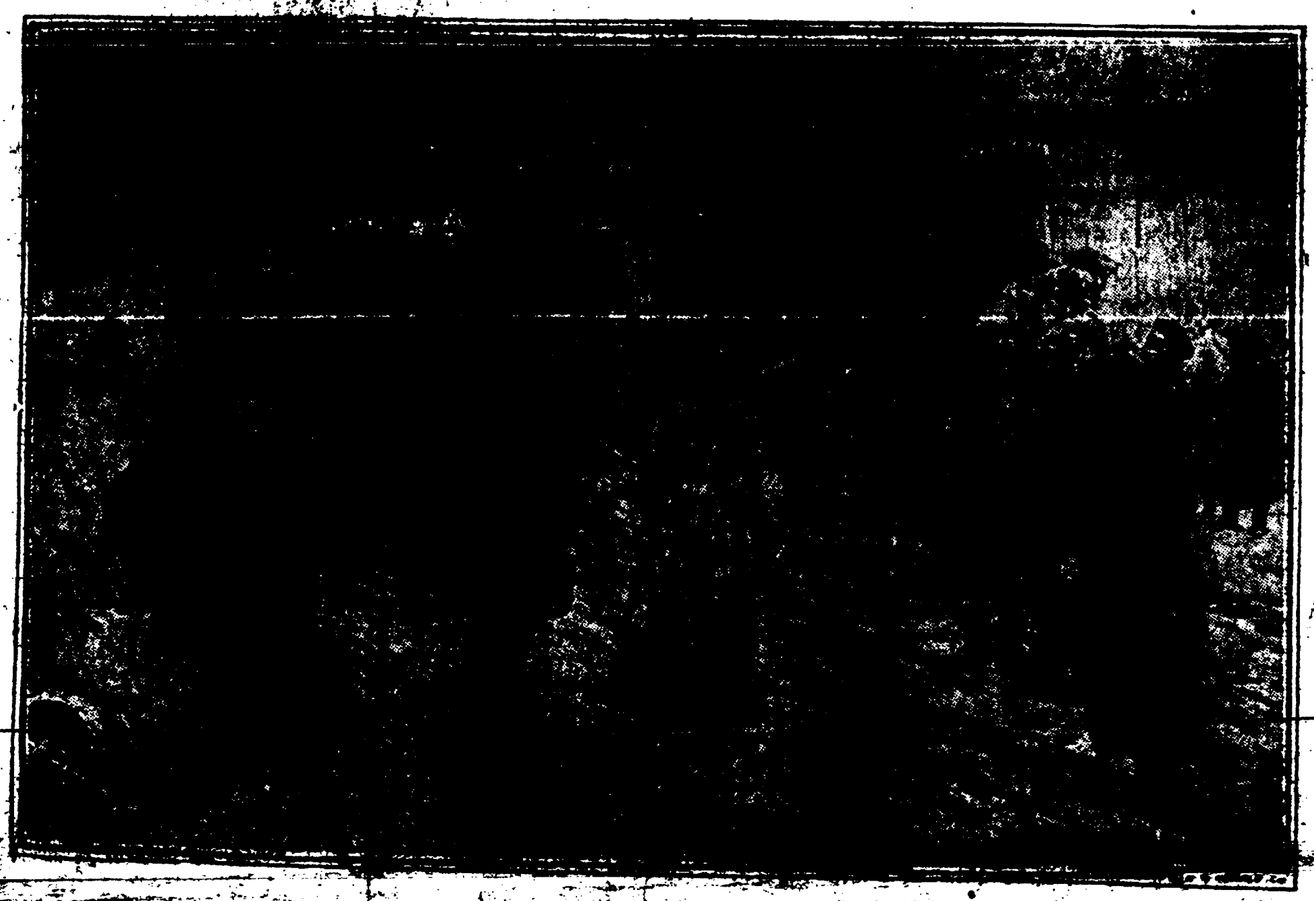
Writer Says Published Explanations Were Framed for That Purpose—Invitation is Extended for Enlightening City's Taxpayers.

Mayor Fox made a statement Monday morning, in effect that there is nowhere in the city public discussion about the causes which led up to the resignation of Clinton H. Hulett from this city's Board of Assessors.

That Mr. Hulett did resign, and that there are men who want to learn through public print his true reasons for refusing to longer serve on the Board, as well as the actual result of the conference between the Mayor, the City Attorney and the Tax Assessors whereat, it alleged, the edict to increase property valuations was issued is made evident by the following communication from one who signs himself :Inquirer":

Editor Evening Times:

Your editorial "Economy where needed" was a very timely warning to the taxpayers of our city. There is waste in every department of this city, and it will continue under the system adopted. Bonded indebtedness is kept piled up to the constitutional limit, we are informed, and a scheme is being devised by the "Bismarcks" of this administration to beat this law, by raising certain assessments arbitrarily twenty-five per cent., in the business sections. So unjust and unfair and illegal did this appear to one of the assessors, that he balked and refused to accede to the so-called "suggestions" and subsequently resigned. Another assessor said he would do likewise, but he seems to have been converted and remains on the Board. The two remaining assessors have made certain denials and explanations which were adroitly framed for publication.



What the taxpayers wish to know among other things, are these: Did the Mayor and City Attorney hold a conference at the Mayor's request with the assessors recently? Did the Mayor or City Attorney there present a written list of certain business properties which he stated should be raised twenty-five per cent.? What reason did he give for this horizontal proposition? Did all the assesors agree with him? What did they say about it? Is it true, as Mr. Merriam says, that no objection was made to this proposition? Did the assessors have a second conference with the Mayor the next day, and if so, why? Is it true that the assessors have begun to follow these "suggestions" of the Mayor and have raised the assessments of properties mentioned by him?

The assessors are public officials and servants of the people. The people are entitled to frank and direct answers to these questions form the assessors.

Let us hear from these gentlemen in the next issue of this paper.

ELECTION DAY; VOTE FOR DIRECTORS EARLY

The election for directors who will serve the Chamber of Commerce for the ensuing first, second and third years has been taking place all day. At 7.30 tonight the polls will be closed and the ballots counted.

Immediately after the result of the election is made known the Chamber will enter upon a session and there will result the election of a president, a secretary and a treasurer.

The election has awakened a lot of interest and indications point to a heavy vote. Not a little electioneering and campaigning has been going on fore several days, with the result that there are a few surprises in store for the people of the city.

Therefore, if you, Mr. Member of the Chamber of Commerce, desire to have your candidates win tonight, go to the polling place—the Chamber of Commerce rooms at once—before the time set upon for closing the ballot box. And do it at once.

Athens Predicts Quick Entry Into the War by Italy and Greece

London, March 31.—Predictions that Breece, Italy and Roumania soon will throw themselves into the European conflict on the side of the Allies were rife today in Athens, following the return to the Greek capital of Mr. Venizelos, formerly Premier. He was acclaimed by the Athenian populace and repeated his assertion that Greece must enter the war against the Teutons.

Measures to stamp out the liquor traffic in England were considered by the Cabinet today, it is believed. Prohibition is still urged in certain quarters as the only effective way to deal with an evil which is giving the nation at this juncture the greatest concern. It is not generally believed, however, that so drastic a measure will be adopted, although it is daily becoming here certain that a comprehensive and nation-wide policy will be formulated.

Speculation centers on German's next move in the military field, for some stroke either in the East or West is expected before the Allies attempt their spring advance. Reports reaching here from Petrograd say the German Emperor is now at Berlin holding a war council with Field Marshal von de Goltz, the German military commander of Constantinople, and other leaders, and is planning a new campaign to offset the fall of Permysl and to meet the Dardanelles situation.

Nothing significant in either the western or eastern land operations has occcurred since the surrender of the Austrian fortress. Sniping, mining and bomb trowing predominate along the west front, while in the Carpathians fighting, fierce but undecisive, rages.

The inquest at Milford Haven on the sinking of the steamship Falaba has established an official death list of 111. Witnesses under oath testified to what had previously been charged, that the submarine fired before sufficient time had elapsed for the removal of the passengers.

Walter Baxter, chief officer of the Falaba, contributed the odd statement that the submarine crew were dressed in khahi. He also swore that the submarine when first sighted flew the British ensign, which was replaced by the German ensign prior to the attack.

Constantinople via London.—An official statement issued today by the War Office says:

"One of our seaplanes has dropped bombs on a British war ship cruising outside the Dardanelles."

Opinions

The Cost of Holding an Election

The facts revealed by the effort of The Times to collect for the first time accurate statistics regarding the total cost, both to candidates and the public, of an average election in this State, as set forth in an article we published on Sunday, show clearly that an overhauling of election machinery is needed badly in New York. In the first place, it was utterly impossible to get at all the figures accurately, even by going to the election officials of every county in the States and to the State election officials in Albany. An amazingly large percentage of the candidates completely ignored the law requiring them to file statements of their expenditures with the local boards, and no effective effort was made by the officials to force them to comply with the law unless opponents happened to raise inquiries regarding their expenses. Township officials were not required to report their expenses because they were "township charges. Nowhere could an interested voter find more than fragmentary details of the public or private expense, much less an accurate report of how the moneys were expended.

From what could be learned of the cost, too, it appeared that the overhead charge of a New York election was disproportionately large. For every dollar spent by candidates, campaign committees, county committees, the public spent $1.44. Eugene M. Travis, the State Controller, reported that a reorganization of the State's election machinery of the State's election machinery would save $250,000 annually, and that "thousands of dollars are wasted annually in the unnecessary compilation of mis takes." Generous remuneration was given employes to ascertain how many times inspectors failed to write a man's name in full, he said, others to tabulate the errors, and added:

> It is not conceivable that such work can serve any other purpose than to keep permanently on the payrolls scores of men who can only be employed with profit to the State temporarily.

The 2,031 election districts in Greater New York cost the taxpayers $375.13 apiece for Eleetion day and the registration days for their formidable array of inspectors, ballot and poll clerks, and pro rata share of printing and other expenses. It is said that fully half of the temporary employes in these polling places could be done away with. Some of them receive $12 a day. It is also said that a great number of the permanent clerks and employes could be done away with; but that would reduce the patronage of the party in power. Each election district is supposed to include about 400 voters—this casts some light on one of the extra expense burdens the taxpayer would have to bear if woman suffrage were adopted in New York.

The suggestion that the Governor appoint a commission to investigate the matter at first hand, confer with the heads of the various boards now established, and then submit a bill for genuine simplification and reform of the election machinery may be a good one; at any rate, it is obvious that some practicable method of reviving the annual cost to the taxpayer, and revising it downwards, and of gathering election statistics where they would be available for scrutiny by the public, should be adopted.—Times, N.Y.

Acceptances Popular

Acceptances are becoming popular with the banks. Of the national banks the National City shows the largest amount of acceptances, the March 4 statement to the Controller of the Currency putting the item at $7,226,858. Other banks showed: First National $750,000, American Exchange National $1,415,600, Mechanics and Metals National $815,337, National Bank of Commerce $3,599,726. This makes $13,907,521 for five national banks. The Corn Exchange Bank reports $975,678. The First National Bank of Chicago has $6,698,000, and the Continental and Commercial National $359,748. The Reserve banks have invested about $7,000,00 in acceptances, and the movement is growing. —Evening Post, N. Y.

GO TO LONG BRANCH?

"Playing together, really having a good time together, unifies any social group whether it be the 'set' at the country club, or the gang of boys in the street, or the family, from baby to papa, which departs as an entirety for the Sunday outing. With the exception of the public parks and zoological gardens and some of the commercial amusements, such as the theatres and the 'movies,' the modern community fails utterly to encourage family recreation.

"On account of the poverty of the masses the actual family dwelling is generally inadequate as a place to play. The way out of the difficulty which at once suggests itself, is through a neighborhood center used by so many families that the per capita cost will not be prohibitive."

The foregoing expression was gleamed from The Survey in an article on recreation centers. It urges with greater building strength the suggestion that Fulton needs too a recreation center. Last summer many of our city's people made Long Branch their mecca on Sunday afternoons. Long Branch, it is stated by those who can speak with authority, give to its patrons a line of amusements not always well planned. Here at home are spots that could well be turned into ideal recreation centers with little effort, and the nature of the amusements could easily be controlled.

There should be a spot somewhere near the city where the family could repair on Sunday afternoons. Comfortable benches arranged in the shade, swings and other playground accessories for the children and a band concert late in the afternoon would call scores of families to it each pleasant Sunday afternoon. Think of the enjoyment there would be for Daddy who hustles early away each work-a-day morning and comes home at night too tired to enjoy the family circle.

There has been little planning of recreation centers where the entire family is brought together yet it is universally agreed that the integrity of the home is essential to the welfare of the community.

The fair grounds, the site near the standpipe and the old canal bed are all splendid possibilities for recreation centers. Will the people of Fulton who are interested in humanitarian principles please rise?

MAIL ORDER HOUSES

The large mail-order houses in Chicago, New York and other big cities are constantly harping on "cutting out the middle man," and claiming that the middle man is the cause of the high cost of living.

If we should cut out the so-called middle man—the retailer, the wholesaler or the jobber—what would become of your city? What would your property be worth? What would become of your business?

What does it mean to send ten per cent., twenty per cent., perhaps fifty per cent. of the money in your town to mail-order houses—catalogue concerns?

The most devoted buyers, the most persistent patrons of catalog concerns want local stores for their own convenience; want goods that they can see with their own eyes, that they can examine into, that they can compare and try on, that they can take home with a guarantee that guarantees.

But all the while these selfsame customers know that in sending away their money they are hampering the local merchant, killing his possibilities of success, compelling him to charge more for his goods, and indirectly injuring their own interests.

The retail merchant, the jobber or the wholesale dealer is present because of a demand, because his presence is needed, because business requires him.

Your city could exist but a short time without its main business thoroughfare, without its merchants.

The manufacturers in your town would give up in despair if they were compelled to rely on the narrow margin of profits offered by a mail-order house; for catalog concerns are acknowledged to be close buyers.

But are they close sellers? Let us see!

It is estimated that the average mail-order catalog costs to print and distribute one dollar a copy. Figure what it means to distribute millions of these catalogs each year—a tremendous expense.

Then add to this total the cost of mailing, and the cost of express charges on orders. Ofttimes the express charges or the postage is a large per cent of the actual cost of the goods. Then again, if the goods are sent by freight, think of the time, the delay, the almost sure disappointment, and eventually the bother to get the goods from the freight house to your home.

It is true that mail-order houses often sell goods cheaper than the local merchant, but it is equally true that the local merchant can and does sell goods even cheaper than the catalog houses.

Value considered, real worth weighed, it is doubtful if any concern can pay postage or express charges and the tremendous printing cost, and deliver real worth, genuine values, cheaper than your local merchant.

This picking out fancy goods on which there is a large profit, and buying them by mail from catalog stores in other cities, asking your local merchant to sell you salt or sugar at about cost, and carrying your credit for thirty or sixty days, is not fair.

One man bought some goods at a mail-order house last summer, and when the station agent notified him that they were at the freight depot, he was actually ashamed to go and get them personally. He hired a one-horse truckman to deliver them at his residence. The man was a prominent manufacturer, and he did not realize, until the goods had arrived, the narrowness, the littleness, the smallness of building up the great cities of this country at the expense of his own town.—Silent Partner.

By FREDERIC T. CARDOZE

Albany, March 31.—That the mere enactment of laws have no vital effect upon the permanency of agricultural organizations, is the belief of Dean Beverly T. Galloway, of the New York State College of Agriculture at Cornell University.

"It may sound like hery or many savor of the paradoxucal to express the opinion that the combined efforts of the federal and State governments, through legislation, have done as much as any other thing to set back thep rogress in the organization of agriculture," says Dean Galloway. "The tendency of most action proceeding from legislation is to force something down on the farmers from above, rather than to build up a structure from below. No amount of legislation, no amount of argument, no amount of propaganda, will permanently establish organization and cooperation unless there is involved some vital, persistent, economic necessity or some great moral question that goes to the root of life itself."

Dean Galloway then adds that for all proctical purposes we can concern ourselves at thep resent time with the matters that have to do with material things. "We must begin at theb usiness end," he says, "and when we learn a few of the small and elementary things to be done there and how to do them we shall have made the beginning of further progress into more complicated fields of endeavor. All will doubtless realize passed away, never to return—when the farmer did not need to look beyond the horizon of his own community in the shaping of his work and of his life."

Although it is agreed almost universally throughout the State that Dean Galloway is an undisputed authority upon agricultural matters, there are certain legislators who take the stand that it has bgeen appropriations which have raised the standard of the State college of Agriculture to its present excellance and that therefore legislation has been a vital fature in the bettering of conditions for the farmer. They point out that millions have been appropriated of recent years for the purpose of making it possible for the farmer to obtain scientific education along agricultural lines and that without these millions the progress which has been made would not have resulted.

Dean Galloway says that the legislature should recognize that the fundamental heed of thep resent time is the facts. "There are already in existencce," he says "many forms of cooperative effort. Some of these are successful; others are not. Wrecks and near-wrecks of agencies are to be found everywhere. They all need to be studied, classified and grouped, so that safe and sane conclusions may be drawn regarding them. The Federal government has fortunately planned its work on this basis. There is a field for the agricultural colleges in the various States to aid the organized agencies, especially in the matter of the work of investigation. The New York State College of Agriculture has organized a Rural Community Service Committee, whose functions will be, first to investigate organization as affecting the farmer's income, and second, to investigate organization as affecting the well-being of rural life.

Dean Galloway says that the factors that make for success include cooperation that connot be programmed, blue printed, diagramed or specified and set down on a group of men or a community. "The motives must come largely from within and must be allowed to work outward, he says.

"Any cooperative effort or organization must recoginze that it is in the field to compete for business," he comments.

Editor of the Times:

I have received a few copies of the daily recently and wish to congratulate you and the people of Fulton on the fine, bright sheet that you are issuing. Also I am very much interested in the good work you are doing in aid of the business revival through the reorganization of the Chamber of Commerce in Fulton. As I read the many articles I am convinced that a real genuine revival is in progress in Fulton. May the good work go on until every citizen realizes that it pays financially to put his and her shoulder to the wheel and lift the good old town out of the mire onto the good solid foundation of true and real prosperity. Thinking that perhaps some of your readers and my old time friends would be interested in a few lines descriptive of the exposition and San Diego, I take the liberty of sending you these few lines. California began in 1542 when Cobrillo sailed into the harbor at San Diego, and later, in 1768, the first of the California missions was established in San Diego by the Franciscan Fathers led by Father Serra of lower California. The first palms and olives were planted at this time and the olive trees are still standing and bearing fruit. San Diego has grown to a city of 85,000. The exposition is being held in Balboa Park, a tract of 1,400 acres which is a city park. Six hundred and fifty acres are covered by the exposition. The main buildings occupy 100 acres. Foreign section 100 amusement features 30 acres, while about 350 acres are devoted to landscape gardens, which can be excelled in real beauty nowhere on earth. As you enter the grounds from the west you cross a re-inforced concrete bridge 135 feet high and about 1,000 feet long which bridges a deep canyon, the sides and bottom of which is set with trees and shrubs of various kinds that grow so beautifully in this fair climate, which with the flowers now in bloom make it one of the most beautiful views imaginable. The architecture of the buildings is called Spanish colonial, which harmonizes so beautifully with the architecture of the early missions. Passing through the entrance arches at the west entrance you first come to the California State building with its cathedral-like architecture and high tower which can be seen looming up above all the other buildings and can be seen from any part of the city. There are nine other buildings, each an exact duplicate of some historic palace of Spain or Spanish America. These main buildings are devoted to "home economy," arts and crafts, science and education, foreign arts, botany, commerce and industry, varied industries and food products.

The New Mexico building is a reproduction of the Indian pueblo of Acoma built in 1699. Sir Thomas Lipton has had hundreds of plants shipped from Colombo in charge of natives, where visitors can see a transplanted tea plantation. The leaves are stripped and tea brewed therefrom for the general public.

The International Harvester Co. has a fine building filled with their products. The Standard Oil Co.'s exhibit is in line and keeping with its varied products. The Cawston ostrich farm shows their products from the egg to the finished plume. There are very many industries and buildings that are representative of various states and counties, which are too numerous to mention in this letter. All must be seen to fully appreciate.

On the Isthmus are located the various amusement concessions, as varied as the flowers that bloom in California. One of these concessions cost $100,000. There are several that are instructive as well as amusing. There are several restaurants, cafeterias and eating places on the grounds where meals can be obtained at very reasonable rates. The hotels and rooming houses in San Diego are ample for the accommodation of the crowds and their rates are quite reasonable. The attendance since March first has improved very much indeed. While the attendance for January and February were much lighter, yet the attendance more than met the expenses for those two months.

I was pleased to meet Martin Dietrich of Fulton last week who was doing the exposition and the great west. He seemed happy and pleased with his trip so far, and I assure you I was pleased to meet and enjoy a good visit with him.

SYDNEY AYRES AND "BLOSSOM."

Sydney Ayres as Dayton Blair, the foreman of the oil fields owned by his sweetheart's father, makes an impressive figure in his latest picture, "A Matter of Parentage." In this drama he has as an appealing little leading lady a tiny girl of about four years. The plot of the story reveals the adoption of the baby by Dayton Blair. Blossom, as he calls her, makes him very happy.

Lee Willard is quite an artist with the brush as well as in his profession. Until the filming of "Broncho Billy and the Revenuer" his accomplishments at drawing were unknown. But in this play Willard can be seen painting Mr. G. M. Anderson as "Broncho Billy" from life.

The photo entertainment, "The Birth of a Nation," combines a pictorial survey of civil war history and of Kuklux Klan days with a love story based on Thomas Dixon's "The Clansman." The battle scenes, engaging thousands of combatants drilled with the well known Griffith elan and realism, are particularly effective. After seeing it some optimists are rash enough to predict that the historical novels of the future will be told in pictures rather than in sentences. It cost to produce nearly $500,000.

It seemed that when the film director who produced "The White Goddess," the three act moving picture production, prepared to take the temple scenes, he secured as many natives of India as was possible. In his effort to secure the utmost realism, this director modeled his temple sets after the famous Temple of the Tooth, located in Kandy, Ceylon.

Cyrus Townsend Brady, the famous author, has written a one reel comedy, "Why Billings Was Late," which contains a superabundance of human interest. Billings' wife has the exasperating habit of taking her own time, but she always seems to get there just the same. Billings prides himself in getting there ahead of time. He fails, however, on this occasion, and his wife laughs best because she laughs last.

Eleanor Kahn and Jack Paul, two ten-year-old children, play a love scene in the photo play "The Little Straw Wife" with exceptional skill. The two children are sweethearts and enact one of the most beautiful scenes of boy and girl love ever portrayed on the screen. The same two characters in the play fourteen years later are portrayed by Edna Mayo and Bryant Washburn.

Albany, March 30.—The danger to [redacted] lands of the Adirondacks are exposed is emphasized by the statement of Conservation Commissioner John D. Moore. Nothing has happened in many months to show more clearly how the woods hang in the balance. That the balance is far more likely to swing the wrong way than the right way is indicated by the fact that Governor Whitman and his administration is in favor of changing the conservation commission from a triple head to a single head. That is, just exactly what men want who would use the Adirondacks as they have used their own lands. That is in accord with the resolution which the pulp and lumber men passed when they held their conference in this city

As Commissioner Moore points out, Ferris J. Meigs, president of the Santa Clara Lumber Company, was on the committee which framed the resolution. Two days before the Court of Appeals had handed down a decision declaring that a State's attorney had no right to compromise a suit by giving a lumber company the timber and taking the land. Thus the Santa Clara Company had to restore to the State timber lands worth upwards of $600,000—timber which it had acquired by stipulation by former Senator J. P. Allds, attorney for Commissioner Middleton. The present commission pushed that suit, among others. Naturally various lumber interests do not like the present commission. It doesn't play the game as former commissions have done and permit what is politely called "trespassing" on State lands.

The Empire State Forest Products' Association and other organizations and persons have carefully carried on a propaganda for some time in favor of the "utilization of mature, dead, down and burnt" timber on State lands. The campaign has had a degree of success, and paved the way for a reorganization of the present commission and for an amendment to the State constitution at the approaching convention. But the statement brings out in clear relief what has gone before and what the hopes of the prime movers are. The realization of the hopes would open the door for bribery and blackmail, even if the State constitutional convention and the Legislature should lay down the best laws and regulations ever formulated for the scientific cutting of a forest. The history of the State forests up to recent times points to no other conclusion than that the woods would be despoiled, if the severity of the constitutional protection were relaxed so much as a word.

As Commissioner Moore points out the men who are behind the move to reorganize the conservation commission and to throw the invaluable forests of the State open to the axe, are, to a considerable extent, men who have been guilty of "conscienceless vandalism," to quote Gifford Pinchot and of things far worse.

Every effort is being made to get the present commission out of office because it has served the whole people of the State and to put into its place a man who can be handled—one who will not prescute the suits by which the State would maintain its hold on $1,000,000 worth of timber. a man who will do as he is told, should the people's forest be thrown open by constitutional amendment to the men who would use it as their own.

A POSER IN SPELLING

Words that are spelled with "ei" or "ie" form a class that is a bugbear in spelling to many persons. A great many master them by simply memorizing each. yet they may be dealt with in away that is quite helpful to school children, and that may not be valueless to grown-ups.

In approaching this poser, it should be noted that the "ei" and the "ie" part of many of these words is pronounced as if it were a long "e", as "ee" in "meet." Seven of these words, all in "ei," four of them verbs and three nouns, are derived from the Latin verb capio, "to take," and are: "Conceive," "perceive" and "receive," and "conceit," "deceit" and "receipt"; and there are scarcely more than five others to be remembered as going with them: "Ceiling," "inveigle," "leisure," "seize and "weird."

Among quite a number of other words with the "ee" sound that are likely to be confused with those above are "lief," "believe," "siege," "relieve," "liege," "pier" and "pierce," all in "ie." Words in "ei" and "ie" having different sounds than that of "ee" normally present little difficulty, as "weight," "eight," "height," "piebald," etc.

This suggestion may appear more confusing than no rule at all, but one who would make use of it ought to give attention chiefly to the second part of the second paragraph. When it is well konwn. the other words alluded to will take care of themselves. —Democrat and Chronicle.

New York's Last Constitutional Convention

By Francis M. Hugo, Secretary of State.

The last, or sixth, Constitutional Convention, which met on May 8th, 1894, ended September 14th of the same year, and during its sessions of over four months, 454 distinct amendments were passed upon, only 33 being finally presented and approved of by the people. These amendments made considerable alterations in the organic law which, with the exception of the judiciary article added in the previous convention of 1867, had lasted for nearly half a century without change. But twenty years have elapsed since then and the people have decided to review the work of this convention with the object of meeting the changes wrought by the needs of the times.

As usual, the majority o fthe delegates were lawyers, 143 out of 168, as compared with 108 out of 168, the number chosen for the approaching convention. In the selection of the presiding officer, Joseph H. Choate and the Chairman of the most important committee, Elihu Root, the convention was supremely fortunate. One of the first acts of this convention itself was a sovereign body superior to the courts of the state. The convention was not inclined to radical measures, for it appreciated the excellence of the old Constitution. Therefore, it was deemed prudent to modify only those parts which changed conditions rendered desirable.

The principal cause for calling this convention was occasioned by the congested condition of the courts, especially the Court of Appeals. To remedy this an Appellate Division of the Supreme Court was created and the superior courts of the cities were consolidated with the Supreme Court. It may be mentioned here that the proposal to return to an appointive judiciary found little support in the convention, while an attempt to shorten the term of the judges from 14 to 8 years was defeated by a large majority. Municipal reforms were undertaken by the cities committee with most commendable patience, with the endeavor of relieving the existing disorder, inefficiency, extravagance and corruption.

Cumulative voting, minority representation, prohibition of special legislation and various other Constitutional remedies of a more or less drastic order were undertaken, but because these were of an experimental kind they were rejected. However, some improvements in municipal government were adopted, such as division of cities into three classes, all legislation affecting them directly to be subject to the approval of the Mayor, or the Mayor and the local legislative bodies in cities other than first class. For election reforms personal registration was required in cities and villages containing over 5,000 inhabitants.

Bi-partisan election boards also were required and citizenship of at least ninety daysp rior to election was provided for all voters. Permanence in Civil Service reform was insured by installing the merit system of appointment based upon competitive examination. Amendments affecting public institutions were adopted and sectarian appropriations by the State prohibited. The reapportionment of the Senate and Assembly districts was the only one subjected to violent partisan attacks, but experience has shown that any readjustments into districts observing county boundaries will always result in enequalities. Of the amendments rejected by the convention, that of women suffrage attracted most attention for the vigorous campaign inaugurated by the friends of this movement resulted in the circulation of hundreds of petitions. It was supported with great ability and enthusiasm and so far as the criterion of the delegates was shown, it had made considerable progress since the convention of 1867.

COST OF ELECTIONS

Expenditures Were Heavy in New York State—Cost in Oswego County

The cost of elections in New York State is treated in the New York Times of Sunday. The total cost, including the expenditures of candidates and party organizations, for the general election last year was was $4,079,171.42, according to the Times' estimate. Of this amount $2,774, 492.53 was spent by State and county election officials In Oswego county the party committees made the following expenses: Republicans, $4,291.19; Democrats, $1,115.49; Progressives, $210. The expenses for candidates to Congress in this district were L. W. Mott, Rep., $1,150; John Fitzgibbons, Dem., $50; L. W. Mott, Prog., $100. State Senate, Elon R. Brown, Rep., $550; G. A. Lawyer, Dem. and Prog.,$517.89. Assembly, I. C. Sweet, Rep. and Prog., $243.35. W. W. Rounds, Dem., $84.65. Constiautional convention delegates, P. W. Cullinan, at large, $105, district, Lewis Ford, $151; Merrick Stowell and Edward N. Smith, $150 each; F. W. Gallagher, V. K. Kellogg, nothing; D. Cosgrove, $50. The expenses of candidates for county offices in Oswego county were as follows: L. C. Rowe, Dem., county judge, $728.57; H. D. Coville, Rep. and Prog., $502.53; F. D. Culkin, Rep. and Prog. district attorney, $122; W. L. Buck, Rep. and Prog., sheriff, $235; C. A. Stone, Rep. and Prog., superintendent of poor, $85; G. M. Fanning, Rep. and Prog., special county judge, $10; C. E. Pitts, Pro., district attorney, $448; E. L. Gardner, Pro., county judge, $10.15.

Teaching Cruelty

There would be less opposition to the endeavors of the anti-vivisectionists if, instead of wallowing perpetually in rhetoric, they were content for a while to confine themselves to a plain retical of facts. If the facts were sufficient to justify their rhetoric, rhetoric would be superfluous, for then there would be no opposition at all.

Mrs. Belais, the hard working president of the New York Anti-Vivisection Society, complains that a bill designed to prohibit the use of animals in school classrooms has been opposed by medical men, "who are apparently so determined to retain an untrammelled right to indulge in vivisection that they are willing to sacrifice childhood." She tells of parents "frightened at the results discovered in the characters of those who are taught through vivisection," and says many have come to her "begging that something be done to take this curse from off their children, whom they see becoming hardened and insensate from the debauchment of science."

Neither does she wonder at this deplorable consequence of the sytematic teaching of cruelty. "The sense of power in the child develops," she explains, "while he holds the squirming, suffering creature in his hand, and it is idle to dream for a moment that any thought of mercy can mitigate his actions when he is doing a thing he is taught to do by those he is taught to obey." Having seen animals tormented, having followed them in "the inferno through which they have passed," the child must inevitably grow up in the belief that cruelty is one of the first duties of man. "Shall we," asks Mrs. Belais, "sacrifice children in this additional fashion to the Moloch of vivisection?"

By "additional fashion" it is doubtless meant that children are also sacrificed by enjoying the benefits of vaccination, diphtheria antitoxin and so forth; but with regard to this particular sacrifice it may properly be asked. Where are the classrooms in question? What is this inferno that Mrs. Belais hints at so darkly and in which of our schools is the power of the child developed b yteaching him to hold in his hands squirming, suffering animals? Mrs. Belais says, "We want publicity—trustworthy publicity." Well, here is a capital opportunity for it.—N. Y. Tribune.

MASSARO GIVEN SEWER CONTRACT

Successful Bidder Agrees to Complete Job Before May 1 —Board Will Not Rebuild Band Stand

Frank Massaro of this city, whose bid totaled $2,445, was awarded the contract for the storm sewer along the towpath at a meeting of the Board of Public Works in the City Hall last night. Anthony DeBerber, the only other bidder, submitted a bid far above Massaro's.

The specifications call for a storm sewer, 1,100 fe. long, starting at the canal bridge and exteending to the Hunter Arms tail race, where the pipe will dump into the stream. The pipe called for is 24 inches in diameter. Work must be started five days after Mr. Massaro files his bond and the sewer must be completed fifteen days after the work starts. Mr. Massaro anticipates no difficulty in completing the contract in the required time and he stated last night that he will probably begin work on the sewer April 7, thereby making the time limit for completion April 22.

The sewer will run along the old tow path and will enter the Hunter raceway at a right angle.

Before the awarding of the contract, the Board listened to several questions by Messrs. Wise and Chadwick of the Hunter Arms Company. In view of the fact that the company plans the installation of a new water wheel and several concrete abutments in their race in the future, fears were entertained that the sewer might interfere with this work and the gentlemen stated that the deposit of the soil carried into the race by the sewers might interfere with their water power. Mr. Wise asked City Engineer Hill, if after a heavy rain, there was any possibility of the water flow from the sewer raising the level of the raceway to such an extent that the flow from the waterwheel might be impeded. Mr. Hill stated that, in his opinion, the sewer would never deposit sufficient water in the race to raise the level perceptibly, and that the amount of soil deposited in the race bed would be very small.

Mr. Wise stated that he expected Attorney Chapman of Syracuse, who is also a director in the Hunter Company, to be present at the meeting, but that Mr. Chapman had been unavoidably detained. He expressed a desire to confer with Mr. Chapman in regard to the project. Thereupon, Mr. Stevenson stated that the Board would assume responsibility for all damages to the Hunter Company caused by the sewer disposal and City Attorney Fanning drew up an agreement to that effect at once. Mr. Wise will confer with Mr. Chapman tomorrow and then the agreement will probably be ratified by both parties. The agreement as drawn by Mr. Fanning will protect the Hunter Co. in every particular, but Mr. Chadwick stated that it was not so much the protection that the company wished but a certainty that the sewer will not cause any damage at the plant to necessitate a shut down. A resolution was passed to the effect that a change in the sewer contract should be made, if necessary, in order to meet the requests of the Hunter Company.

Before the meeting started an informal discussion in regard to the curbing and paving of several streets took place. The subject of a new band stand at the City Park this year was also taken under consideration and while nothing was done officially, from the sentiments expressed by several members of the board, it does not seem likely that any stand will be erected this year at least.

GAME CLUB ACTIVE

All Streams Stocked With Fish and More Coming

During the next two weeks, the Fulton Game and Gun Club will hold its first meeting of the 1915 season. While no definite date has yet been decided upon the members will be notified by card. The principal business of the meeting will be the election of officers for the ensuing year and the discussion of plans for the club's future activities.

The local club now boasts a membership of approximately 100, and it is expected that the coming season will be the most successful in years. While no trap shoots have been held this winter, the club house and grounds at Stop 27 will be the scene of severarl events of this kind in the near future. Several other features are contemplated, among others, a monster clambake on the club grounds this summer.

The club has stocked all the stream in this vicinity including Lake Neahtawanta with pickeral, perch, bass, trout and other game fish each year. A consignment of young fish from the State Game Commission is expected within the next two weeks.

HOLY WEEK SERVICES AT BAPTIST CHURCH

Rev. M. G. Buck, pastor of the First Baptist church, addressed a large and devout congregation last night in the first of his series of Holy Week sermons. Mr. Buck brought out three main points and explained the lessons that can be drawn from these. He cited a withered fig tree as the first lesson and compared the tree to the man who, outwardly professes Christianity, but within his soul has nothing. Christ will blast such men in time and they will not bear fruit as the other trees of men who have the strength of brotherly love and faith in their hearts. The second point made by Mr. Buck was true charity. He showed how the widow, in giving her mite, was more charitable than the wealthy man who gave only a small tithe of his possessions to the poor. In closing Mr. Buck told how the Jews rejected Christ, and spoke of the Saviour's life and works up to the last week of His stay on earth.

DEAN BARRY'S ESTATE

Surrogate Miller made an order yesterday afternoon directing the County Treasurer to make an appraisal of the estate of the Very Rev. Dean Barry, who died in Oswego last October. The estate has never come into the Surrogate's Court. It was said that purpose of the order was to determine whether several bank accounts held jointly by Dean Barry and Dr. R. W. Barry were subject to the payment of any inheritance tax. These bank accounts, it was stated, total between $3,000 and $4,000.

A son, Charles, asked that letters on the estate of Henry Nettles, who died in Oswego March 14th, be granted to John F. Dain, Jr. The petition gives the value of the estate at $300 personal and $4,500 real.

The new wireless station in the Panama canal zone, which is the largest and most powerful in the world, has been completed. WINDS PLAYED WITH DERBY

"What's sillier than a derby hat?" says Jane Addams, and one Fultonian, by name, Ernest Gomon, is ready to say "What, indeed?" and thereby hangs a tale.

Mr. Gomon today left his domicile on the West Side and repaired to East 1st st. in quest of Easter regalia. Having found the treasures which he sought, with high heart and light step he homeward wended his way. It was while crossing the lower bridge that the "fly got into the ointment" and dispelled Mr. Gomon's rosy vision of Easter morn. It happened in this wise.

Mr. Gomon wore upon this occasion that style of headgear known as "derby." The little March winds happily at play seized upon the object, looping-the-loop with it until dizzily it fell into the race way below. Remembering the days of close companionship which he and the derby had enjoyed the owner started to the rescue. A little crowd gathered to watch results. Hurrying down the finight of stairs leading to the raceway all might have gone well had twine been stouter built. One of the packages containing the Easter finery burst open, and the contents, a pair of trousers, plus a box of choice weeds tumbled out. A muddy puddle near received the trousers, but "what's that when a dear old derby is drifting away" thought Mr. Gomon and he tarried not at all.

Reaching the raceway path the owner of the hat ran quickly down it and jumped into a boat tied there. The boat became tangled in the underbrush and the hat sailed by. After an hour's hard work the boat was returned to its place, and hatless and dejected, Mr. Gomon returned for his packages, but a lonely pair of muddy trousers alone greeted him. The box of choice weeds had vanished! The rest of the story is left to the imagination of the reader.

T. W. SKINNER

The Hon. Timothy W. Skinner, dean of the bar of Oswego county, and one of its best known residents, died at his home in the village of Mexico this morning about 8.30 o'clock. Death came after an illness of a week with inflammatory rheumatism.

Mr. Skinner was born in the town of Mexico April 24th, 1827, and had he lived until next month would have celebrated his eighty-eighth birthday. His father was the late Hon. Avery Skinner, who was born inNew Hampshire in 1796, came to Union Square in 1822 and died there in 1876. The family was a prominent one in the history of Oswego county. The father of Mr. Skinner was a Democrat and was postmaster at Union Square during all of his long residence there, having been appointed by President Adams. He was fifteen years Associate Judge of the County Court and for sixteen years was county treasurer and seryed in the State Aseembly in 1831-32 and was a State senator from 1838 to 1842.

It was amid such surroundings and in such an atmosphere that the Hon. T. W. Skinner was ushered into life. He was educated in the schools of Mexico and graduated from Mexico Academy, then one of the best educational institutions in northern New York, in the class of 1847, probably the oldest of the alumni of the school living. After graduation he studied law and was admitted to the bar in Watertown in 1857, and has since practiced in Mexico. For fifteen years he was the junior member of the banking house of Whitney & Skinner, the senior member being the late Cyrus Whitney. Mr. Skinner was elected Surrogate of the county and held that office for eighteen years, a longer term than any other man. He was president of the village of Mexico, justice of the peace and served the public faithfully and well. After his retirement from the office of Surrogate he had a largep ractice in that court and has been a frequent visitor to Oswego.

Mr. Skinner was a member of the Masonic and Odd Fellows societies, being one of the oldest in this section of the State.

Mrs. Maurice L. Wright, of Oswego, is a sister of Mr. Skinner, Charles R. Skinner, of Watertown, and the Rev. James A. Skinner, of New York, are brothers. Avery Warner Skinner, of Albany, is a son, and Mrs. Junius B. Stone, of Auburn, a daughter.

The funeral will be held at his home in Mexico tomorrow at three o'clock.

DONOVANITES TAKE THIRD STRAIGHT GAME

Daytona, Fla., Mar 31.—Eighteen hits for a total of twenty-one bases, netting twelve runs, was the Yankees' portion of yesterday's game against the Superbas. The eleven swats made by the Brooklynites, who also mixed in a trio of doubles, netted them only five runs, giving the Yankees a clean slate for the series of four games played here.

Cadore was the only twirler for the Dodgers who did not sucer from the swatting. This was probably due to the fact he was on the mound only one inning. The other pair, Ragan ann Coomsb, were hammered unmercifully and without favor.

The game was won in the first three innings. After the Yankees had gathered a pair of runs in the lrst two chapters they jumped on Ragan in the third for a quartet of tallies. Pipp was safe at lrst on Cutshaw's error, Cook flied out to Myers, Mullen followed with a double, and on Boone's single Pipp and Mullen scored. Boone scored a minute later on Nunamaker's double, Keating kept up the clean hitting by sinbling to right, and Nunamaker scored on Maisel's infield tap that Ragan threw poorly. In the seventh and ninth frames they simply toyed with "Iron Man" Coombs.

Brooklyn's best inning was the lrst, when they gathered a pair of runs on a base on balls to Schultz, Cutshaw's double and Hummel's single. Their othr three runs were distributed through seven innings.

The absence of Daubert, Wheat and O'Mara considerably weakened the Dodgers' play.

"Jake" Daubert, who hurt his right foot in Sunday's game against the Yankees, will leave for his home in Brooklyn Thursday. He will work out slowly in Brooklyn with several pitchers who will probably leave after Saturday's game in Jacksonville. Bill Klem, the umpire, will go north Thursday morning.

Score by innings:

Brooklyn	2	0	1	0	0	1	0	0	1	— 3

KIRMAYER SUCCEEDS IN WINNING GAME

Marlin, Tex., Mar. 31.—The "Seymours" and the "Devlins" were on the field for their daily encounters and, as usual, the Seymours were trailing when McGraw called the game after the seventh inning. The Devlins' won by the big score of 14 to 6. The pitchers were wise enough not to get up a perspiration in the cool gale. Kirmayer made his first appearance in the box since he fell a pictim to la grippe and showed no ill effects of the malady other than weakness.

Thorpe hit Kirmayer for a home run in the first inning, but after that the youngster was more effective. Pehritt pitched good ball too. Palmero is defeloping into quite a good outfielder. A strong wind cut many kinds of tricks and kicked up lots of dust, but outside of that the day was all right for practice.

Of course that isn't exactly the way in which clubs and their managers will finish in the 1915 pennant race. Modesty prevents us from placing the Utica team in the position in which it is very likely to end the season.

The Baseball Writers' Association of the New York State League will hold its annual meeting in connection with the league session and one of the matters to be taken up is an improved system of averages for the league. The official records of last season failed to include the extra base hits, stolen bases and sacrifice hits, all of which are too important to be left out. The method of arriving at the rating of the pitchers has also been unsatisfactory because of the fact that it does not provide for showing the number of games won and lost. For the last two seasons the pitchers' averages have been arrived at by dividing the number of hits oc them by the number of times opponents appeared at bat.

Scranton has picked up a Taylor, Pa., youngster by the name of John Griffiths. He is to receive a trial in the box.

Elmira would like to have Emil Meusel back in left garden this season. The hard-hitting outfielder is dissatisfied with his shift to the Los Angeles, Cal., club and has notified Conroy that he will make an ecort to promised a satisfactory salary for the season.

Pete Noonan, Wilkes-Barre's manager, has signed Pitcher George Lowe, who was with Newburg in the Atlantic League last season. Wilkes-Barre is gradually corralling quite a collection of pitchers and other players. With Newburg last year Lowe turned in 12 victories and eight defeats.

In a letter to Charles M. Winchester, president of the Albany baseball club, Joe O'Rourke, new manager of the Senators, says he probably will arrive in Albany next week. In the meantime O'Rourke will try to sign two young players, who he says he has been watching for two years. "The old fellows will have to show something to beat these mn out." O'Rourke writes. It is more than likely that O'Rourke will remain in Albany after he arrives next week, as it is not believed he will return to Philadelphia again before the State League season opens.

The annual schedule meeting of the State League is expected to take place either this week or next week. There is a strong possibilty that the meeting will take place in Albany. President Winchester has asked President Farrell of the State League to call the meeting in Albany as a favor to him and it is believed that Farrell will agree.

There'll be nothing to the Bobby Wilson-Shamus O'Brien bout at Albany tonight but fight. Shamus is of the bear cat type, rushing, aggressive and game, while Wilson is a boy who has never backed up after toeing the line, no matter how hard his opponent hit or how fast he worked. It will be great action between a pair of boys who are capable of traveling at top speed. At least, that's what an Albany scribe thinks.

Albinos.

Albino is a term first applied by the Portuguese to the white negroes of West Africa and is now applied to any individual in whom there is congenital deficiency of pigment in skin, hair, iris and choroid of the eye. The skin is abnormally pale, the hair is white or pale flaxen, and the iris is pink. The absence of pigment in the iris renders an albino's eyes sensitive and partially blind in the sunlight. The chief predisposing cause is heredity. It may also be due to congenital arrest of development and is sometimes associated with other malformations, but it often occurs in persons who are otherwise normal. White mice, white rabbits, white elephants, etc., are albinos.

CLUB AIDED ROAD CAUSE

The Many Road Improvements In This Section are Due to Work of Local Automobile Club

After untiring efforts on the part of the Futlon Automobile club, the Hannibal road is now assured and work will be begun on the stretch next month.

President R. E. McCully, is in receipt of a letter from Speaker Sweet promising early action on the project and it is expected that the work will be completed by July. This announcement comes as a welcome result after the long struggle by the club to ahve a state road in Hannibal town.

The club made its first step toward securing the road last fall when a delegation from thisc ity went to Oswego to confer with the State Supervisor. Later President McCully and Mayor Fox went to Watertown and had a conference with John G. Carlise, then Commissioner of Highways. Mr. Carlise was also conferred with in regard to the road in Syracuse later on and and at a banquet to the state officers of the Automobile Association in Oswego, the local delegation assisted by Speaker Sweet brought up the matter again.

Hannibal town has never had a foot of state highway and it is due directly to the work of the local club and Speaker Sweet that the road is at last assured.

Although no action has ever been taken to reduce the grade at Crosby Hill, at the end of Oneida st., the club is plannig a campaign to improve the road on the hill, and at the same time an effort will be made to have the grade reduced as much as possible. Work on the end of Seventh st. where the Whitaker road enters the city, is contemplated by the city, and all these features will meet with the approval of motorists and residents in the section and otherswho use the roads.

The State Highway department will open bids April 20 for the resurfacing and improvement of two other highways in this vicinity. One contract will call for five miles of bithulithic macadam on the Fulton-Bowens Corners road in the town of Volney. The road is in bad condition at present and the improvement will be welcomed by residents in that section and by local motorists.

The other contract will also be on the Fulton-Bowens Corners road. A stretch almost three miles long will be resurfaced with bithulithic macadam. Two local contractors expect tobid for the work.

The Fulton club plans a very active season this year. The planning of club runs, and several other social features will be arranged at the first get-together meeting of the club which will take place some time in April. A banquet is planned for the first meeting, and the speaker will be Lucius Wilson of the American Cities Bureau, who supervised the Chamber of Commerce campaign. Mr. Wilson is to address the club on the field of an automobile club in connection with civic progress, and the date for the banquet will be set as soon as the club officials learn when Mr. Wilson can arrange his schedule of engagements in order to be on hand. The banquet will be held in the city hall.

The club membership numbers over 100 atp resent and an active campaign for new members will be started at the first meeting. The first club run will also be planned at that time.

HEART INTEREST STORIES FROM TRENCHES AND BATTLEFIELDS

By mail and in dispatches from old world newspapers there have arrived in this country human interest stories of the great war in Europe. Some of the latest and best are here given:

"If I am lucky enough to survive this war I am afraid that I will be satisfied with very little, just a bed and a crust of bread," writes a twenty-year-old Belgian soldier to his brother, Paul L. Herz, a diamond cutter, of 46 East street, New York city. Young Herz is serving with the Fourth Regiment of Belgian infantry.

This letter was made public by the Belgian relief committee. It bears a February date and in part reads:

"Although for more than six months we have lived like savages, remaining four nights without sleeping and eight days without washing, and have fallen into ice cold water and kept our wet clothes on for days, I have never felt the slightest attack of illness nor even had a cold. We live absolutely like Indians in the bushes and are occupied with all professions, such as carpenter, cook, digger, laundress and shoemaker.

"As for the life in the trenches, in which we spend four days out of every eight, it is at times frightful, especially as since quite a while our trenches along the Yser near Nieuport have been bombarded night and day. Shells and shrapnel pass by, whistling, without ceasing. Sometimes they fall at fifty meters, then again at ten or five inches from us. Then again one falls flush in the trench. Then we pick up our dear comrades and repair the parapet. Then we wait for our turn to come.

"The inundation prevents us from advancing, and when we are called upon to do advance post duty we often wade in ice cold water up to the belt. Our trenches in spots are less than 200 meters from the Germans, and we always have to be on the alert.

"A couple of days ago I was called upon to guard a bridge which was mined with dynamite by our own Belgian sappers, when I noticed that the Germans were directing their gunfire upon the bridge. The second shell was fifty meters short, but the third was too long. I heard the shot of the next. After two seconds the shell announced itself by its horrible whistling; then a black cloud, a frightful explosion, and I was flung on my back. Once more I got up, unharmed. The bridge did not blow up, only a hole in the flooring. I found this moment particularly horrible, inasmuch as I was certain that before five minutes would elapse I would go up with the bridge, and I could not move from my position because I had been stationed there.

"One gets completely demoralized at times and allows oneself to live like a brute, like an unconscious being. However, at times we sing and play cards and laugh at the slightest provocation."

New York Girl's Experience.

The experience of a retreating army pursued by a victorious army was shared by a New York girl when the left wing of the Austrians was driven out of Lemberg by the Cossacks.

Miss Bertha Zwillich, who lives with her brother, Samuel Zwillich, at No. 1390 Prospect avenue, the Bronx, New York city, was visiting relatives at Boroslav, in northern Galicia, when the Cossacks invaded the Lemberg region. Boroslav was in the rear of the Austrian left wing, which was supposed to be the strongest. But the terrific onslaught of the Cossacks smashed it, and the Austrian army was driven back into the Carpathians.

Miss Zwillich, with hundreds of refugees, went with the Austrians, tramping for weeks with the army and eating some food as the soldiers.

"Days and days" [illegible] walked and ran with hundreds as we fled toward Budapest. We were right with the retreating army itself, and we ate daily with the soldiers. We all shared alike. Then we reached Uzsok pass, in the Carpathians. There I saw a number of horrors that I don't like to think of.

"I saw two men, a woman and a twelve-year-old girl shot down by stray bullets while I was in the streets of Uzsok. The Russians caught up with us very close there, and down in the town we could look up on the mountain tops near by and see the shells bursting almost over us. I was an eyewitness of the fierce encounter of Uzsok pass.

"After that we tramped on in the same direction—toward Budapest and Vienna. We took turns walking and riding in carts. Clothing and the few things we could snatch up as we left our homes we carried with us. For more than two weeks this terrible strain kept up. At one town we stopped for a rest, but there was an outbreak of cholera, and again we started on our flight. At last we reached a railroad and were transported in freight cars to Budapest. I saw some things so horrible that I will never speak of them.

"I have twenty cousins, all in the Austrian army. The Galicians did not want war at all, but, once in it, they said: 'We will win. We must win.' And that is still their cry and their spirit. In a letter I have just received from Budapest I am told that my uncle, forty-two years old, has not been called to the colors and that conditions are very good. My relatives have received mail from the garrison at Przemysl by the aeroplane post. They say the garrison is holding out splendidly."

Miss Zwillich left New York last May to visit relatives in Boroslav. She was forced to leave nearly all of her clothing behind in Boroslav. When she reached Vienna she was cared for by the American consul there. In Vienna she spent some weeks making cigarettes for the soldiers and then volunteered for the Austrian Red Cross.

A Miraculous Escape.

"I am now permitted to state that the artillery attached to the East Lancashire division of territorials was sharply engaged on the Suez canal during the fighting of Feb. 3 and Feb. 4," writes an English correspondent.

"The behavior of the men under fire and the skill with which the guns were served were considered worthy of very high praise.

"An officer controlling the fire of one of the territorial batteries in these engagements displayed conspicuous gallantry. In order to find the ranges with the greatest possible accuracy he climbed a date palm tree near by and remained there an hour while the position was bombarded with shrapnel. When the fire became too hot he took up a fresh position in another palm tree and remained there till the close of the battle.

"One territorial gunner had a remarkable escape. A shrapnel bullet passed down the barrel of the gun he was serving and flattened itself against a part of the breech mechanism without doing any damage either to man or gun."

"Hobson's Choice."

Alfred Capus, co-editor of the Figaro, in a lecture on "The Press During the War" gave the following as a typical dialogue between the censor and an editor over the telephone.

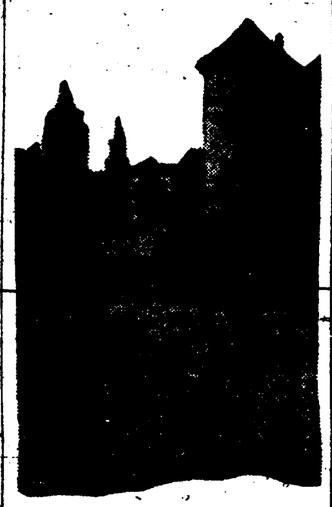
About midnight the censor said:

TO PRESERVE STREET SURFACE

Processes Followed in European and American Cities.

SOWING STREETS WITH SAND

Much Greater Service Is Got Out of Foreign Highways by Protecting Them in Various Ways and So Facilitating Traffic Than Is the Case in America.



[By Frank Koester, consulting civic engineer, New York.]

After laying an expensive asphalt or wood block street, city authorities in American cities seem to feel that their whole duty has been performed. The street is immediately left to the mercy of traffic and the elements and nothing more is done until some serious repairs become necessary.

A very different process is followed in European cities, which consists in protecting the street and in facilitating traffic, so that much greater service is got out of a street than in America.

The principal expedient adopted is to sprinkle or cover the street lightly with various substances whenever weather conditions or other reasons require it.

Sand is much used for the purpose, and is scattered over the streets in a number of ways. Sometimes a man with a trowel-like tool, carrying a bag of sand suspended from his neck, sows the street with the sand after the manner of a farmer sowing grain broadcast. Another method of distributing the sand is by means of small box-like carts and shovels, one man pushing the cart and another sowing the sand. The cart is often the same one used for collecting refuse.

A WELL KEPT STREET IN KOENIGSBERG.

The method with shovels and cart is not so expeditious since the sand in such cases is spread more thickly. There are also automatic sand sowing machines of different types which are more rapid.

Among other materials used are a coarse sand or very fine gravel and fine stone particles. All such materials should be dry and perfectly clean and free from dirt or impurities which would prevent free scattering or subsequently cause dust. Ashes are only used in case of an emergency.

The material for street sowing is kept in boxes holding from one to three cubic yards in convenient locations, being thus at hand whenever needed for use.

Applications are made when the streets are covered with ice, sleet or frozen snow, in the case of cold, drizzling rains, or during precipitation caused by fog or after heavy rains, when the weather conditions are such that the streets will not readily dry. A twofold object is attained by such sowing: the slipperiness of the street is overcome and safety for cabbies and pedestrians assured, and the surplus water is absorbed by the sand so that it does not lie and rot the surfacing.

As streets are only flushed at times when the water will readily dry off, there is no occasion to sand the streets after flushing.

When bodies of men are to pass over icy streets, the sand or small gravel to be scattered is first moistened with a solution of salt, as it will then the more quickly attack the ice.

Sand in being sown on the streets should be used as sparingly as possible to accomplish the desired result. A very small quantity is found sufficient for a considerable area.

When the conditions of ice or moisture which made necessary the application of the sand have passed, it should all be removed, as otherwise the streets will become dusty.

In good weather asphalt and wood block streets are treated with an oil emulsion. Applied five or six times during the summer, all the desirable results are accomplished that follow from a daily watering.

Street sweeping in winter, a difficult work, owing to the cold dust stirred up, is accomplished in an efficacious manner by first sprinkling the streets with a chloride of calcium solution which lays the dust and so melts the frozen dirt that the street sweeping machines can accomplish their work.

WAR ON THE BILLBOARD.

From its very institution the American Civic association has devoted itself to the protection of the public against three great nuisances—smoke, poles and wires and billboards. At the recent annual convention of the association in Washington one of the important subjects discussed was billboards, with a principal address entitled "The Passing of the Signboard," by Jesse Lee Bennett of Baltimore, in which he recounted the steps that had been taken for the legal control of the billboard in all parts of the United States.

Concerning the sentiment against the billboard Mr. Bennett said: "The feeling against the signboard has become nation wide, and in the past few years the agitation of civic organizations has been so successful as to awaken resentment against it so widespread that from coast to coast and in almost every state and city there are now, or have been, vigorous movements seeking the abolition or regulation of these unnecessary and disfiguring objects.

"There has been much agitation, and from it there has been distilled one thing—the recognition of the fact that what is called the signboard problem is a question more complex than the mere removal of the signs. The signboard has been found to be inextricably intertwined with two questions of even greater importance—the awakening of civic sentiment and the recognition by legislators and judges of the validity of arguments based upon aesthetic considerations."

Commenting on what ought to be the attitude of the law and the courts toward the billboard, he added:

"It would take our psychologists but a few minutes to show that it is not a question of ear or nose or eye, but a question of the brain and of the very consciousness that is life itself. No law should permit any man to intrude or force himself or his business into another man's consciousness to the extent that outdoor advertising has come to permit, an intrusion immeasurably increased by the fact that it is impossible to avoid seeing signboards."

SUNDAY BATS A HOME RUN.

Evangelist Back on Diamond For First Time in Twenty-four Years.

Although he had not been in the professional field for twenty-four years, Billy Sunday stood up at bat before Ben Shibe, owner of the Athletics, on the diamond on the Phillies' grounds, knocked a homer the first crack and circled the bases in sixteen seconds.

"I've still got some of the old time pep left," he said. "If I'm not as good as I used to be, I'm sure I could train up in a short time and make my living on the diamond again if necessary."

At Shibe's invitation Sunday took a whirl out to the field while his assistants conducted the routine prayer meetings in the Tabernacle. Ripping off his coat, Sunday grabbed up a bat in the clubhouse and dashed for the plate, where he dropped into his old time pose and waited for Shibe to toss one over. Ben put the first ball squarely over the plate. Sunday made a vicious swing, caught it squarely and finished the bases puffing like a steam engine.

TWINS BORN FAR APART.

Oddly Enough They Also Have Different Birthdays.

A boy and a girl, twins, were born in Alliance, O., on different days and at different places.

They are healthy, and their mother, Mrs. Rosina Folgia, thirty-two, is doing well. The girl was born shortly before midnight in the Folgia home. The next morning Mrs. Folgia was taken to a hospital, where she gave birth to her son. He weighs ten pounds. His sister weighs six and one-half pounds.

THIEF TOOK COAT AND FEVER

A good mackintosh and a million, more or less, full sized scarlet fever germs was the extent of booty obtained by a sneak thief who entered the home of Dr. Preston Steele of Greenville, Pa., and took the coat from a bag hanging on the back porch.

The garment was used by the physician exclusively in entering the sick rooms of patients suffering from scarlet fever. The police are watching the board of health reports.

Germans and Belgians are battling under two small affluents of the Yser river, in front of Ramscappelle. The cellars and underground passages of a battered monastery extend under the rivers, and the Germans hold the northern outlet to the subterranean battlefield and the Belgians the opposite exit.

BUDAPEST AS A SUPPLY BASE

Capital of Hungary Forwards Supplies to Army in Poland.

Budapest, the capital of Hungary, is the principal base of supplies and provisions for the Austro-Hungarian army. This city, 250 miles from Przemysl, must provide enormous quantities of flour, preserves, sugar, tea and everything else necessary for the maintenance of the millions in the field. In addition to this Budapest must provide food for its own population of 1,000,000 souls. These provisions are requisitioned in a country whose men between the ages of nineteen and forty-two have gone to war and where the work of field and household is done mainly by women, children and old men.

From many quarters in Europe one hears of the enormous increase in the cost of living, of disturbed economic conditions and of the cessation of commerce and industry. But while Budapest is naturally affected by war conditions, she has no great reason to complain. Very few shops have closed their doors. In front of the bakeries and butcher shops there are no large crowds clamoring for provisions. There is no apparent widespread stagnation.

Despite the many great difficulties that must be overcome, the victualing of the city goes on fairly smoothly. To be sure, Budapest feels the adversities of war in many ways. The cost of living has gone up, for instance, but the increasing prices do not exceed those which prevailed in times of economic crises.

Novel Plan For Prisoners.

The city of Racine, Wis., has adopted a novel plan of handling prisoners committed to the county jail. When a man is sentenced to less than sixty days he is not forced to spend his day in jail, but may go about his daily duties, reporting to the jail and sleeping there every night. His meals, too, he must take in the jail refectory. All money earned during this term is turned over by the so called prisoner to his family. Further than that, the sheriff of Racine has upon occasion found a job for a man who had no work when arrested. Assistant Secretary Walter Ritter of the local Commercial club has had a series of pictures taken of the men working under this new system of penal restraint.

CHARACTER.

A good character is every thing. A good heart, benevolent feelings, and a balanced mind lie at the foundation of character. Other things may be deemed fortuitous; they may come and go; but character is that which lives and abides.—John Todd.

FERTILIZER FACTS

Geneva Experiment Station Has Three Helpful Bulletins Ready for Free Distribution

The Geneva Experiment Station just issued three new bulletins. One is entitled "Fertilizer Facts for Farmers." This bulletin, which can be had for the asking, points out various possible economies in buying fertilizers. It says that fertilizer users in the State could save thousands of dollars by buying the fertilizer ingredients separately and mixing them at home.

A table shows what nitrogen costs the farmer in low grade complete fertilizer, and what it costs in high grade complete fertilizer. On the average it costs him 32½ cents when he buys low grade and 24 cents when he makes a purchase of high grade complete fertilizer. So high grade complete fertilizer, while it costs more per ton, is cheaper because the farmer gets more plant food in it. The same is true when phosphoric acid, potash and calcium and magnesium are taken in account.

The bulletin says that the average price of low grade fertilizer is around $26 a ton, while the high grade costs about $34.77. The low grade price was $8.66 or 48 per cent. above the average retail value of the ingredients, while the average price of the high grade goods was only $6.62 or 23 per cent, above the commercial value of the ingredients. It is plain, therefore, that the high grade is the cheapest, for one isn't paying for so much filling. It is also apparent that the farmer can save the $8.66 or the $6.62 if he mixes his own fertilizer. The bulletin contains a number of other valuable hints about fertilizers.

Fraud Paint

The worst mistake one is likely to make in painting is wrong paint; it is easy to make.

We all say "Ours is the best"; and there are 1000 of us. One is best; but a dozen are so near on a level that no-one knows, for sure, that his is the one.

The worst paints are worst liars; they know what they are, put-on a bold face, and brazen it out.

Their one true argument is low price; but low-price paint is always, must be, a fraud; it is made to cheat cheatable people.

RUSSIANS TO BE KEPT OUT OF CARPATHIANS

London, March 31.—Major Moraht, the military expert, attaches the highest importance to the fighting now taking place in the Carpathians. According to a Sofia dispatch from Amsterdam, he has written as follows from Austrian headquarters to the Berlin Tageblatt:

"We should be going too far as to consider that the result of the entire great campaign in the eastern campaign depended upon the issue of this battle, but nevertheless victory here undoubtably will exercise a strong influence on the general situation.

"Nor can we completely exclude the possibility tha the political situation may be affected in one way or another. Russia, in any case, had political reasons in choosing precisely this ground for a decisive battle. This is the view of intelligent Hungarians and also of the Vienna press.

"The supreme army command has grounds enough for employing all disposable forces to avert a Russian interruption into the Hungarian plain."

LATE WAR BULLETINS

Germans to retire in disorder from the village of Jeudicourt, to the northeast of St. Mihiel.

"At all other points in the war zone the day passed quietly; no infantry engagement took place."

GERMAN

A telegram from main headquarters dated March 30 states that on the entire theatre of war there were only artillery combats and reconnoitering operations.

"In the fighting which led to the occupation of Tauroggen (Russia, near the Prussian border), the East Prussian landsturm, according to a report from Prince Joachim of Prussian especially distinguished itself, taking 1,000 prisoners.

"Near Krasnopol the Russians suffered sever losses. Some 2,000 were killed. Our booty in this fighting until yesterday evening was 3,000 prisoners, seven machine guns, one cannon and several ammounition cars.

"On the Skwa, near Klimki, after a Russian attack failed, we captured two Russian officers and 600 men. Near Olcny, on the left bank of the Omulew, two Russian night attacks were repulsed. Russian attempts to cross the lower Bzura failed."

RUSSIAN

Petrograd, via London.—The Russian war office today made public the following official communication:

"On Sunday a German vessel approached Libau (on the Baltic) and fired two hundred projectiles, killing one civilian and wounding another. No soldiers were injured.

"On the front, west of the Niemen river, the fighting continues. On Sunday near the village of Strumbagtow, eight miles northwest of Lozdzieje, we captured remnants of a German battalion which had been attacked by us with the bayonet, numbering two hundred.

"On the right bank of the Narew, between the Skwa and Omulew fighting continues fr the possession of the isolated woods and heights. We have driven the enemy out of the region around the village of Wach.

"In the Carpathians, between the points leading to Bartfeld and Uzok Pass, our actions are developing with perfect success. Notwithstanding the enemy's stubborn resistance and a series of desperate counter attacks, we again carried some fortified positions on the heights and captured, on Sunday and Monday, 76 officers and 5,384 men, and five guns, 21 machine guns and one trench mortar.

"A detachment of the enemy advancing from Czernowitz (Bukowina), on Sunrda forced our frontier and pushed forward half way to Chotin. Measures have been taken to meet this incursion."

AUSTRIAN

Vienna, via London.—The War Office today issued the following official communication:

"Vigorous fighting again occurred on Monday in the district south and east of Lupkow. Strong Russian forces resumed the offensive and the battle lasted into the night. The enemy everywhere was repulsed with heavy losses.

"Obstinate fighting also has taken place between the Lupkow ridge and the Uzsok Pass. In attacks south of Dwernik (Swidnik), the presence was noted of troops of a division belonging to the Russian forces at Permysl.

"In South Galicia, on the Dunaje and in Russian Poland the situation is unaltered."

ROUND ABOUT

Fortunes of war have thrown together some 10,000 members of the army and navies of the countries with which Germany is at war into the conglamoritic gathering in the huge prison camp at Doeberitz, about 19 miles from Berlin. According to the officer in charge, "the Russians are the most industrious, the English are by far the laziest and the hardest to handle, and the French are the most docile, the last to make trouble of any kind."

A few days ago a man who gave his name as Hans Ernest Udwyler, called at the office of the visiting Swiss consul in Philadelphia and asked for money to pay his way home. When he produced a Swiss passport the consul became suspicious because of the man's German accent, and called the Washington authorities. Sunday night Minister Ritter of the Swiss Legation in Washington was notified to intercept the man, stating that he was connected with the Swiss Government and learned that the Udwyler passport had been stolen from the owner in Argentina three years ago, and that Udwyler now is living in Switzerland. The Philadelphia police arrested the man. They have a theory that is connected with a plot to dynamite the steel works at South Bethlehem, Pa., where great quantities of war material are being made for the allies.

Enrico Caruso is to sing in Buenos Ayr s during May, and will leave Genoa for that city at the close of his season in Monte Carlo. He is to give 10 performances in the South American city at $7,600 a performance. This is the largest sum ever received per performance by a singer. When in New York the tenor receives $2,500 a night.

Dr. Louis C. Fulton was the attending physician at a Pittsburgh hospital when a male child was born on March 16. The infant was getting along well until a hemorrhage started last Monday afternoon. No relative besides the baby's mother being in the hospital. Dr. Fulton gave a pint of blood from his arm, which was transfused, and the infant has left the hospital in excellent condition.

New York Board of Aldermen has "three perpendicular bars of blue, white and orange." They are the old Dutch colors, used when New York was New Netherlands.

According to a Petrograd correspondent, the Russian fleet in the Baltic has been reinforced by the addition of modern fighting units. This addition to the fleet is believed in London to consist of four dreadnaughts laid down in Russians yards in 1909, which were nearing completion at the beginning of the war. It may also include another division of four capital ships laid down in 1912. British naval experts said they would not be surprised to learn that with the assistance of the allies in material and men, Russia had been albe to complete those eight dreadnaughts. The first four mount 12-inch guns. The second division is armed with 14-inch puns. A Russian fleet on Sunday bombarded the outside forts and batteries on the Bosphorus on both sides of the straits.

The nomination of a successor to State Commissioner of Agriculture Huson brings another Wilson into some of the limelight. He is a professor in the Cornell School of Agriculture and appears therefore to be well equipped for the position.

Pincus Zatulove, who was born in Kiev, Russia, in 1814, has just died in the Bronx, New York. His long life recipe was total abstinence from worrying, long walks, plenty of fresh air and a moderate indulgencce in tobacco and liquor.

According to a telegram received by the Navy Department from Admiral Moore, the submarine F-4 has been located in from 40 to 60 fathoms of water about a mile and a half from Honolulu. All hope of rescuing the 21 men aboard has been abandoned.

For the last year the United States and various South American states have been playing shuttlecock with one Nathan Cohen. He arrived in New York two years ago with a moderate fortune. He went south, where he had relatives, and there lost his money. His strange conduct caused immigration officials in Virginia last year to order him deported. The steamship company which took him to New York took him back to Rio de Janeiro, where he could not prove he was a citizen of Brazil. He was rejected at other South American ports, returned to the United States, rejected and carried backward and forward. At last it occurred to a benevolent organization to give a bond that Cohen would not become a public charge, and the Government saw a great light. He will be permitted to land.

The Truthful Lyre.

I had my lyre attuned to sing—
The lyre, of course, is metaphoric;
A reg'lar poet has to spring
It now and then to give a Doric,
Grecian touch unto his fling.
The custom's punk, but quite historic.
Well, then, I had it tuned to play
A melancholy, winter lay,
With snow and ice spread thick as sin
And winds that howl across the heather,
When who the dickens should come in
But spring, the wench, with April weather.

Oh, very well (says I), I see
The season's more than usual fickle,
And tries to get the jump on me
To put my verses in a pickle.
I laughed at this quite mirthlessly—
"The chances aren't worth a nickel.
I'll turn the lyre upon the time
And sing a lay about the clime.
The birds and blooms in April train,
When who the deuce comes back again
As big as life, but old man winter!

Curran's Grim Joke.

"I cannot sing; I really cannot," protested the fabulous Lord Norbury of "hanging fame" to a pretty and pressing hostess. "I have neither words nor voice."

"You are too modest, chief justice," said Curran, who was standing by, "for I know hundreds that have hung on your words and thousands that have been transported by your voice."

CUSTER OPERATOR QUITS KEYBOARD

Telegrapher Who Flashed Massacre Retires From Game.

ON DUTY TWENTY-ONE HOURS

Carnahan Sent Eighty Thousand Words in Two Shifts, and Receipts of His Office in Two Days Were $3,000. Newspaper Man Gave Carnahan Fifty Dollar Bill For Extra Work.

John M. Carnahan, the telegraph operator who sent out from Bismarck, N. D., one of the biggest stories the world ever read—the story of the Custer massacre on the Little Big Horn in July, 1876—has just retired on a pension and is planning to spend the rest of his days in Oklahoma on his Kay county farm, where he will raise chickens, pigs and other domestics.

For seventeen years Carnahan was at the frontier station of Bismarck and when he left there it was for Missoula, Mont., where he lived for twenty-four years. Previous to being stationed at Bismarck he was at La Crosse, Wis., and so after fifty years as an operator Carnahan will draw a pension, and Oklahoma will have within its boundaries another veteran who helped make the history of the early days of the Indian west.

The Bismarck garrison, including many friends of Carnahan, was in the Custer expedition. The operator and the post surgeon rode out from the post with the expedition when it started in June, 1870, to punish the Sioux Indians. They went twelve miles with the Seventh cavalry and then returned with the last dispatch General Custer ever sent. It was addressed to President Grant and told of the plans for the expedition.

On the night of July 5 the steamer Far West came down the river and tied up at Bismarck when most people were in bed. The Far West brought the wounded from Reno's command and the official dispatches which told of the complete annihilation of Custer's outfit.

Flashed Word of Massacre.

Carnahan was called from his bed and found on his desk in the telegraph office a carpetbag full of official reports of the fight and its results. He sized up the job, and his first wire action was to flash the word east that the massacre had occurred. Then he settled down to the transmission of the official story to the department of war at Washington. For twenty-[illegible] hours he did not leave the key. Coffee and sandwiches were handed him [illegible] and then during the long shift, a wet towel was kept on his [illegible] With the reports finished he [illegible] bed and for three hours slept [illegible] of exhaustion; then he got up [illegible] turned to the key.

BIRD SCARES PEACH MEN

Sparrow-like Visitor Has Many Growers Up in Arms.

The perennial rumor that the peach crop is about to be destroyed cropped up in Egg Harbor, N. J., when employees in the large orchards of Charles F. Stuckel discovered a small, reddish brown bird on the trees.

With its small, stout, pointed bill the bird, which is about the size of a sparrow, was attacking the buds ferociously, much in the manner in which woodpecker works his way in search of worms. According to the Stuckel force this particular bird has a capacity of about 6,000 buds an hour.

Several of the birds were shot and sent to the state agricultural experiment station at New Brunswick to determine whether they are protected by law. Meanwhile the farmers are taking down their shotguns to save their peach crop.

STONE AND CONCRETE BAND STAND WILL BE DONATED TO THE CITY

Community Jack Wax Party to Be Held in East Park Monday Night, April 5

A new bandstand, a thing of beauty and a joy forever, is to grace the city park. Monday night a huge cauldron will be swung over the spot where the old stand was until recently and maple sugar and maple syrup will be made from the sap of the handsome old maples in the park.

This good news reached The Evening Times this morning in a communication which the writer, the doner of the proposed bandstand asks to be made public.

John W. Stevenson, who last summer was active in the Elks' carnival insuring its success, and who contributed to the occasion the huge white elk which stood in Oneida street, will give to the city's park a beautiful modern bandstand. The affair will be constructed of stone and concrete. The plans are at present in the hands of a skilled landscape gardener and a Syracuse architect, and will as soon as completed be submitted to the city for its acceptance of the gift and too the plan thereof.

The bandstand as described by Mr. Stevenson as expressive of his idea will be built in Roman style. While in Denver, Colorado, last year Mr. Stevenson saw his exact ideal of a bandstand and how it should conform to its surroundings.

"My idea," said Mr. Stevenson, "is to give an exact duplicate of that bandstand to Fulton."

The description in detail as given by Mr. Stevenson is that the plans call for a circular floor space sixty feet in diameter. There will be no roof, and four entrances of stone steps will lead up to the stand. Entirely surrounding the stand, except for the four entrances, will be a solid stone and concrete wall-like arrangement. On the interior, a seat will be built following the entire wall space. On the exterior built in boxes for flowers, vines, etc., will be arranged. In the center of the floor space a fountain will splash and fancy fish will sport away the sunny hours in the basin below.

Mr. Stevenson has caught the true spirit of adding to our city's civic needs, and when asked if the plans for a bandstand and band concerts in the park would not conflict with the plans of the Elks for their roof garden concerts this summer he replied he thought not.

"Just because I am so interested in the local lodge of Elks is no reason why I should want the Elks to have a monopoly on the band concerts this summer," was Mr. Stevenson's direct answer.

The city has granted permission to Mr. Stevenson and his workers to tap the park trees tomorrow. The wood from the old band stand will kindle the flames beneath the cauldron. The children of the city will be in charge of the Community Jack Wax Party Monday night to which the people of the city and surrounding country are bidden. The children will ask five cents apiece of those who partake of the Jack Wax. The proceeds will be used to purchase the flowers and vines to adorn the boxes of the new bandstand. The band will be present to add to the merriment of the occasion. M. F. Colwell of the Emery road, and expert in making Jack Wax, will be in charge of the cauldron. A merry time is anticipated.

To those who have followed closely every word of this most interesting local story it would be to search the calendar and observe the day else the foregoing statements might be taken seriously. If it meets your approval pass it on while the day is yet young.

KING WILL ABOLISH LIQUOR FROM HOUSEHOLDS

London, April 1.—A tremendous sensation was caused last night when King George, in a letter to Mr. David Lloyd George, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, volunteered, if it was thought advisable, personally to give up the use of all alcoholic liquors and to issue an order against their use in all the royal households. The King's remarkable stand against drink was made public in the following letter to Lloyd George:

"Dear Chancellor of the Exchequer:

"The King thanks you for so promptly letting him have a full report of the proceedings at yesterday's meeting of the deputation of employers. His Majesty has read it with intense interest, but also with the deepest concern. He feels that nothing but the most vigorous measures will successfully cope with the grave situation now existing in our armament factories.

"We have before us the statements, not merely of the employers, but of the Admiralty and the War Office, which are responsible for munitions of war and for the transport of troops and their food and ammunition. From this evidence it is without doubt largely due to drink that we are unable to secure the output of war material indispensable to meet the requirements of the army in the field, and that there has been such serious delay, in consequence, of the necessary reinforcements of supplies to aid our gallant troops at the front.

"A continuance of such a state of things must inevitably result in the prolongation of the horrors and burdens of this terrible war.

"I am instructed to add that if it be deemed advisable the King will be prepared to set an example by giving up all alcoholic liquor himself and by issuing orders against its consumption in the royal households, so that no difference shall be made, so far as His Majesty is concerned, between the treatment of the rich and the poor in this question.

"Eye Witness" Says Germans Had 50,000 Machine Guns In August

London, April 1.—Declaring that there has been too much importance attached by the British public to the reports in the official statements of the frequent capture of German machine guns, the British "eye witness at the front" in a summary of the events of last week says:

"It must be remembered that to the Germans the loss of one or several machine guns does not represent what at the beginning of the operations it would have meant to us, with our then vastly inferior total and proportionate number of these weapons.

"It is believed that before the war commenced they had available altogether a stock of 50,000 such guns, apart from any that may since have been turned out by their arsenals. Their employment of them, therefore has in a certain sense been prodigal and carried out with a disregard to loss, which is only comprehensible when the large reserve of these weapons in their possession is borne in mind.

"To the Germans a machine gun represents merely a piece of machinery of immense killing and stopping power which has cost a certain sum of money, but it is less vulnerable and less valuable in every way that a number of men and rifles of equivalent killing powers.

"The one principle guilding its employment, therefore, is that, provided the gun has earned its keep or paid for its cost by the number of the enemy slaughtered, its loss or destruction does not count. For them, it has been a matter of the exchange of mechanism costing a few pounds, which can be repaced at once, for a number fo lives, which cannot be replaced within a generation. This, of course, applies to the gun alone, and not to the highly trained specialists who handle it.

"It may be of some interest to say to those who are not acquainted with the weapon that a machine gun at the ordinary rate fires 500 rounds a minute. From the sector of the defences at Neuve Chapelle, where the Germans had fifteen machine guns within a length of a front of 250 yards, 7500 bullets could have been discharged in one minute, in addition to those from the rifles of the infantry manniny the parapets.

"What effect this stream of lead would have against assaultiny infantry, either held up by obstacles or advancing over clear ground at a slow pace, which is alone possible to heavily weighted soldiers is obvious."

AUSTRIAN

Vienna.—The Austrian War Office today made public the following official communication:

"The situation in the Eastern Beskid range is calm. Fighting continues in the eastern sectors. On the heights north of Dima and northeast of Kalnico several Russian day and night attacks have been repulsed.

"North of the Uzok Pass (Carpathians) Russian night attacks failed, with heavy losses to the enemy. We captured a further 1,900 prisoners.

WIFE OF THE COMMANDER OF THE MISSING SUBMARINE AND SURGEON WHO IS WAITING TO AID THOSE ENTRAPPED

LIEUTENANT EDE'S BABY NOW 3 YEARS OLD

Mrs. Alfred Louis Ede, wife of the commander of the United States submarine F-4, lost off Honolulu, is the daughter of William McMillan, onetime State Treasurer of Nevada, and Mrs. McMillan. She is the niece of Dr. A. G. McKenzie, of Boston, and lived at his home during the five years she was a student at the New England Conservatory of Music.

Surgeon William Seaman, in charge of the hospital force waiting to aid those entrapped aboard the F-4, wedded a daughter of Dr. McKenzie. Mrs. Ede and Mrs. McKenzie, besides being cousins, had been chums for many years and had perfected arrangements for having Miss Irma McKenzie, Mrs. Seaman's sister, go to Honolulu in June for a long stay. The disaster to the F-4 has caused Miss McKenzie to abandon all idea of the trip.

Aviators Drop Bombs on Basin and Shops; Submarine Shelled

German Airmen Fly Over Allies' Warships Near Zeebrugge; Taube Is Brought Down; Two Men Are Killed

On the Belgian Frontier, April 1.—The Allies' aviators, in continuing their activity in the Zeebrugge area, which is directed primarily against the German submarine operations, are descending to a daringly low altitude. Faced by a bombardment of shrapnel and rifle fire an aviator yesterday dropped five explosive bombs on the basin at Bruges. Bombs also wered ropped on adjacent workshops. The extent of the damage is not known.

Many trawlers in Zeebrugge Harbor are being armed to act as convoys and scouts for submarines. Six seaplanes are concentrated there.

The Allies' warships which have been assembled before Zeebrugge since Monday morning have fired a number of shells into the harbor with the intention of destroying a submarine lying near the shore end of the breakwater. Four German aeroplanes yesterday made several flights from Ramscapelle and subsequently flew over the warships. One, I hear, was brought down, the aviator and observer both being killed.

FRENCH

Paris, via London.—The following official communication was issued by the War Office today:

"In Champagne there have been artillery actions in the region of Beausejour and Ville-Sur-Turbe.

"In the Argonne there has been incessant activity, particularly between four Four de Paris and Bagatelle. The fighting at some points was so close that a trench mortar struck by one of our heavy bombs was projected into our lines.

"On the night of March 30 and 31 we captured 150 meers of trenches, taking prisoners and two mortars. Throughout the day the enemy bombarded the [illegible] which we had lost.

"On March 30 in the forest of Le Prêtre the Germans delivered a counter attack at 4 o'clock with several battalions and succeeded in again setting foot in the western portion of the wood, but at eight o'clock he was dislodged from it. The gain realized on the 30th, therefore, has been entirely maintained. We took some prisoners, including an officer.

"In the region of Parroy there has been outpost fighting which ended in our favor.

"Our airmen, in the course of flights on the night of the 30th, dropped twenty-four bombs on stations and enemy bivouacs in the Woevre, in Champagne, in the Soissons district and in Belgium. Today the maritime station at Bruges and an aviation camp at Gits were bombarded."

"No modification of the situation has been reported since the last communication."

RUSSIAN

"On the front west of the Niemen fighting continues. In the environs of Mariampol our troops are successfully making progress. On the 30th they forced the Germans to fall back in haste and made prisoners of about two hundred soldiers and two officers and besides captured two machine guns.

"In the Carpathians our offensive continues. On the 29th we made fresh captures of prisoners, namely, thirty-eight officers and 1,750 men, and also took five machine guns.

"Our Black Sea fleet has bombarded Zunguldak, Koslu, Kilimli and Eregli (ports in Asia Minor about one hundred and fifty miles east of Constantinople). The bombardment caused a series of heavy explosions and a number of fires."

"In the coastal districts there has been gun firing. Our troops acting on the offensive from Borchka and Ardanutch occupied Artvin, throwing back the Turks to the south.

"Nothing of importance has taken place on the other fronts."

GERMAN

"West of Pont-aMousson French attacks near and east of Regnieville and in the forest of Le Pretre were repulsed. The enemy suffered heavy losses, and at only one place to the west of the forest of Le Pretre in the engagement still continuing.

"Hostile aviators yesterday threw bombs on the Belgian towns of Bruges, Ghistelles and Courtai without doing any damage to military establishments. In Courtai, near a hospital, one Belgian was killed and one wounded.

"On the Russian frontier, in the district north of Memel, the banks of the river were cleared of the enemy. The Russians were defeated near Tauroggen and retreated in the direction of Schaedraity.

"Russian forces which during the last few days advanced north of the Augustowo forest against the German position were repulsed by Germans who advanved into the forest lake district near Seiny. The number of Russians taken prisoners in the engagement near Krasnopol and to the north and east was increased by 500. Near Klimki, on the Skwa, 220 more Russians were captured."

Home Rule Election Law

Senator Walters is preparing an election bill which will save the state nearly $200,000 a year and the counties a very large amount of money. The measure will conform to the requirements of the government that there shall be no change in the direct primary law nor in the Massachusetts ballot. Mr. Walters proposes to have but one commissioner of election instead of three, to reduce the number of deputies and to economize on printing, etc. The enrollment envelopes, for example, cost $20,000. What the purpose of sealing an enrollment blank can be is a mystery. Some stationer must have been interested in the law. A paper ballot goes into the box without an envelope. The enrollment blank needs no more than a proper fold to make it secret until the time comes for publicity. The senator also proposes to hold the primary of all parties at the same place in each election district. By this plan a saving of more than $12,000 in booka is accomplished.

Owing to the opposition of legislators who want to hold patronage the governor's suggestion of abolishing county election commissioners has been side tracked. If the governor wouldn't stand for conventions and the party circle the legislators didn't feel like surrendering the jobs. No reason except the patronage reason has been offered for the election commission burden on the counties. Mr. Walters has in mind an election commission system for counties in which there are first and second class cities and an optional provision in this regard for the other counties. For example if Jefferson county prefers the bipartisan commission now provided in the law it may retain that system. If on the other hand it wants a single commissioner or none it may follow its preference. The point is that each small county must take full responsibility for its own payroll. This idea will accomplish precisely what the governor had in mind—economy or the home rule opportunity for economy. Senator Walter's bill as outlined will improve rather than harm the election law.—Watertown Standard.

Sanctioning a Brace Game

To Mr. J. Mayhew Wainwright, as much as to any man in this state, is due credit for New York's possessing a workmen's compensation law. He was chairman of the legislative committee which investigated the subject and prepared the original law, declared unconstitutional. His researches, his work to have enacted a new law under the amended constitution, his service on the commission created by that law, have made him an acknowledged expert. When, therefore, he warns the Governor against signing the "direct settlement" amendment, now pending, there is nobody who can speak more authoritatively.

There is no doubt in Mr. Wainwright's mind about the viciousness of the proposed change. "I am opposed," he said, "to the sanction of law upon any game where one side is playing with loaded dice. The employer or his agent, the casualty company, would hold the loaded dice." The injured workman or his widow and children, would be the victims.

New York State has guaranteed justice in the handling of compensation claims. She cannot sanction a brace game. Unless Governor Whitman wants to help along this measure for victimizing the injured workers, the widows and the orphans, he must veto this bill.—N. Y. Tribune.

A School Without Pupils

The State of New York has many examples of what happens when it undertakes public ownership and operation. It has been building a school for 11 years for the training of boys, and although it is costing the State today $1,000 a week, no boy has been trained there yet. Moreover, the State has sunk $800,000 in this school at Yorktown Heights. There is a superintendent at $4,500 a year and maintenance for himself and family, and his payroll includes a clerk, a stenographer and bookkeeper, a superintendent of farm, a head cook, a matron, a servant, three teamsters and two laborers.

Perhaps some day this school will have a teacher to eat what the cook cooks and to have a salary for the bookkeeper to keep track of.—Observer, Utica.

LEARNING TO GARDEN

The amateur gardener who today desires to have his knowledge increased, and the would-be gardener who has no practical knowledge may both grow in wisdom through the offices of the State College of Agriculture at Cornell.

An advanced reading course in vegetable gardening has just been started in order to meet the growing demand for home study as shown by an increase of 51 per cent in the enrollment of the reading course for the farm during the past year. According to the latest figures 10,000 persons are now enrolled in home study courses.

The advanced reading-course in vegetable gardening is carried on by means of a textbook and correspondence. The work of those taking the course is graded, and suggestions are made by specialists. In this way individual attention is given to each member of the course. The textbook may be obtained for $1.65, which is the only expense involved. The course now offered is said to be especially timely, and may be taken immediately. Amateur gardeners who would like to receive information, without expense, may secure two reading-course lessons entitled "Home Garden Planning" and "Planting the Home Vegetable Garden" upon request.

Vegetables, it is pointed out, may be grown in door yards, vacant lots, and upon the farm with little expense, and much may be obtained from a small garden properly handled. Further, by growing fresh vegetables for the home table, the consumer may not only add to the health and enjoyment of the family, but may also reduce his living expenses, and even supplement his income by the sale of surplus products.

Further information about the advanced reading-course in vegetable gardening may be obtained by addressing the Reading-Course for the Farm, College of Agriculture, Ithaca, New York.

NO BACKWARD STEP

If there were any virtue in the "direct settlement" scheme of handling damage cases, proposed in the amendment to the workmen's compensation law which is before Governor Whitman, the commission might be expected to know it. Chairman Dowling says he can find none. No demand has come from employer or employe for such a change. The idea of returning to the old order of dickering between the worker and his employer is particularly objectionable. In short, Mr. Dowling can see "no benefit in the provision for any one unless it shall turn out in operation that the injured employe or his dependents will receive less compensation than at present in which case the insurance companies alone will be gainers."

When a change in law is advocated it inevitably devolves on the proponents to justify their measure. No justification for this change has been presented. Its legislative backers have not proved that there is any flaw in the present handling of damage cases by the commission to warrant experiment with another method. Mr. Dowling gives his testimony that the proposed system would not lessen expense and might increase it, since every settlement would have to be examined and agreed to by the commission before it could take effect. There is just one condition certain to result if the change becomes law—a restoration of the old system of bargaining between employer and employe, with the advantages all on the side of the stronger, which the compensation law was passed to end. In other words, this amendment would deftly and by indirection hamstring that excellent statute. And the insurance companies, the commission's chairman insists, would be the sole gainers.

New York State cannot afford to step back in so important a matter as workmen's compensation, where now she leads the country. She certainly cannot afford to emasculate her excellent law in order to put bigger profits into the pockets of a small group of business men.—Press, N. Y.

LOW TARIFF RESPONSIBLE

Vice-President Conover Fitch of the Waltham Watch Company, in discussing the reasons for their placing three thousand hands on short time, stated: "The truth is that we have been obliged to reduce the number of working hours in our establishment because of the extreme depression in this country. That the depression here in our business is due partly to the effects of the Eupropean war is undoubtedly true, but in my opinion it is MAINLY DUE to the change in tariff and policies of Government. It is a fact that Swiss manufacturers are taking advantage of reduced tariff duties and loss of their European markets to flood this country with their products, regardless of price."

COURT ORDERS THAT DEED BE ACCEPTED

The judgment of Justice DeAngeli in the action of Chester R. Dewey vs. John E. DeLong, an action to compel the defendant to accept the deed to certain farm property in the town of Mexico, was filed yesterday in the County Clerk's office. The plaintiff claimed that a land contract was made with the defendant, one year ago today, in which the latter agreed to purchase the farm in question for $6,500 of which $1,000 was paid down and the balance was to be in the form of a bond and mortgage in $5,500 for ten years at 5 per cent. Mr. Dewey claimed that the defendant had declined to accept the deed and carry out the provisions of the contract. The matter was brought before Justice DeAngelis at Utica recently and judgment was given in favor of the plaintiff.

ALBANY LETTER DAY BY DAY

Albany, March 31.—The people of the State who reside within the radius of operation of the Empire Lyceum Bureau of Syracuse, will shortly have an opportunity to hear from one on the inside, about what goes on in the Senate of the State of New York.

Senator Samuel A. Jones of Norwich, at one time an assemblyman, regarded as a reformer by his fellow legislators and admirably equipped by nature with a commanding figure and stentorian voice, is to take to the lecture platform at the conclusion of the present session of the legislature and will deal with the subject of making laws during his course.

Considerable has been said and much has been written about what goes on behind the scenes at the Capitol, but the lectures of Senator Jones will have been the first evidence of a denouement by a member of the legislature in harness. He has already prepared a lecture on "The Senate from the Inside" and another on "A New Note of Optimism." A third lecture will deal with the subject "Things That Count."

Whether Senator Jones, whose legislative experience covers two sessions will attempt to exploit the fine points of political astuteness or will deal with legislation from a parliamentarian standpoint is not known. It can be safely said, however, that his remarks will be well worth hearing. Senator Jones is not unknown as a lecturer having talked from the rostrum frequently in the past.

If you should ask Senator Jones if he was a reformer, he would reply that he was not. He has been an advocate of reform legislation, notwithstanding, in so far as opposing legislation which would make Sunday a holiday instead of a holy day. He has not always agreed to the program of his party, nor has he voted according to expectation upon all the bills that the Republican party has been interested in. For his stand, however, he has made rather than lost friends, it is said. It is an incident of interest that Senator Jones comes from the same place as Jotham A. Allds, who resigned from the Senator after a sensational investigation caused by Benn Conger, a fellow Senator.

Senator Jones was a pioneer in championing direct primaries. For seven years he has preached this gospel. His entire life has been a battle for independence in politics. He is one of the few men in the Senate who is said to be free from orders from his senatorial district, as to his course in the upper house and who is uncontrolled by a boss. He believes, he says, in the principles he has expounded times almost without number that a man ought to own himself and live on good and friendly terms with his conscience.

The rise of Senator Jones was due to his own individual efforts. He was one of a family of ten and at the age of twelve was thrown upon his own resources. In the summer he worked and in the winter he attended school, working for his board; he was extremely poor and was obliged to walk two miles to and from the school house without an overcoat. In spite of these hardships he was graduated from Oxford Academy, studied law for two years and then taught school for two years more.

The next move of the future senator was to enter the clothing business in Norwich. His views upon political questions won him recognition and soon after his business venture he was named as postmaster of his home town. For seven years he safeguarded the billet-doux and business communications which came to and were dispatched from Norwich. In 1914 he was elected to the Assembly and last year he was made a senator. Soon he will be a lecturer and his friends say there will be plenty to deliberate over in his remarks.

WAITING

N. Y.

We are told that April's showery, and we know that May is bowery, and we also know they'll chase Long Tom away. And we hope the sun and rain will bring us buds and flowers again, for last spring seems farther off than yesterday. We have drunk the maple's sap, and we've heard the pecker's tap, and we've listened to the robin's chir-a-pee, but the time seems very long, and we feel there's something wrong, for there's snow and ice still left along the lea. We are waiting for the spring to send out her welcome ring of green leaves and blossoms for a morning lay. We are waiting for the time when we hear the buzzing chime of the bee, while gathering sweets the live-long day. It will thrill our souls to see how very happy youths can be, as they stroll and sing alone a bright spring path; for when youth and springtime meet they are always to greet all the romance that time ever had or hath. Then while today may yet be cold, northern blasts are growing old, and quite soon they'll surely die and fade away. We have truly loved you, winter; but it's time you smashed to flinter, for we're waiting for those welcome flowers of May.

ENEMIES ARE ASSETS

THE most important and necessary thing to the man who is determined and resolved to get ahead is to evolve an enemy. Our enemies are our greatest friends. They keep us on constant watch and compel us to use constant care. Opposition is essential to success. We measure the value of things by their resisting power, and particularly is this true of men.

It is the business of our enemy to question our sincerity, and in this way to compel us to become more earnest about the things we do. Our enemies are alert to find us off our guard, and this cultivates a tendency to be cautious, to live well, to work hard and to look back over the trail across which we have come to discover and analyze our mistakes.

If our work is being watched by our enemies, by those who would destroy us, then we are compelled to do our work better, to plan more carefully, to live up to a higher and more perfect standard, to turn out a better job, to write a finer and more convincing article and to conduct a more perfectly managed department or business.

Fortunate is the man who has an enemy! Those who are sincere about life, who are in earnest about the work they are doing will believe in us if we are in reality sincere. They will understand us if we mean the things we say and are in dead earnest about the things we purpose to do.

Such men will believe in us if we believe in ourselves. They will trust us if we trust ourselves. Such men do not deal in flattery or praise. They live, act, work and discuss things as man to man.

Men of this type are fine companions. They make up a fine and beautiful environment. They lend courage and inspiration to us along the way. They are wholesome and strong, manly, and, above all, they are sincere about all things. But these men cannot and do not afford the same inspirations that we get from the "dwarf" who is prejudiced and insincere; from the pigmies who gather along the side lines to throw mud—to decry, discourage, despise and destroy.

These "pigmy-enemies" are our greatest assets. They are upon us at the first misstep on our way to better things. They camp along our trail, watching for some irregularity. They know of our ideals—they have seen the star of our hope. They have discerned a sincerity in our work; an earnestness in our method.

They have a sort of consciousness of our beautiful ideals, and it is their business to follow us along the pathway of every-day affairs, to point the finger of scorn and to whisper to their kind that this man is not sincere, that his aspirations are artificial, that his ideas are borrowed and plagiarized.

The moral is: Blaze your way straight to the front. Never stop to explain. Your work and your life will be their own explanation. Do not give your enemies an opportunity to involve you in foolish arguments, wranglings or petty misunderstands. Your enemies are your buoys or sign posts—the guides which point the way. To the man who is going somewhere, who intends to be something, who expects to accomplish things, enemies are assets.

Your enemy, whose ambitions and aspirations have been frozen into icicles of hate and jealousy, dwells, figuratively, in dingy dugouts or adobe huts at the foot of the hill, and your way lies to the top of the peak beyond.

We can ask for nothing better, nothing more desirable, than to be encouraged, strengthened and driven by those who have a desire top pull us down.

If you have an enemy who is attempting to daub with mud your Star of Hope, then you must increase the glory and luster of your star.

"CO-OPERATION, NOT COMPETITION"

New Principle, Says Judge Gary, Leads Thinking Men to New Efficiency in Cutting Human Wastes

"Never before within our memory has there been a time when so many problems fundamental to true progress presented themselves to thinking men. They have to do with the whole scheme of the organization of society and its interests, especially as regards those things that must always primarily concern the great majority of men and women, the industry, commerce, and other activities which form form the basis of their individual and social welfare, and which enable them to be efficient, both individually and also socially and politically.

"Correct decisions leading to just action during the next few critical years will mean much to the solidity and permanence of this republic. The continuance of misunderstandings, of mutual criticism, and of working at cross purposes among the men and groups of men who are shaping our destinies, may serve to carry us into errors from which a full recovery may not be possible."

So declares Judge Elbert H. Gary, chairman of the United States Steel Corporation, in an article in the current issue of the Market World, in which he discusses the widening recognition of co-operation as a principle in dealing with business and human problems. Continuing, he says:

The tendency of the times during the last few years seems to have been opposed to business progress. This has been shown in publications, utterances of public speakers, introduction of many vicious bills into the legislative branches of Government, the passage of some unfavorable laws and, in some instances, a disposition to go beyond reason and justice in the effort to administer the laws. The reason for these adverse conditions has been partly the fault of the business men. We had become more or less careless in management, indifferent to the rights and interests of others, regardless of our responsibilities toward those for whom we had become trustees, as directors, officials or otherwise, and unmindful of the general public welfare.

Behind the clash of armies, trained economists and students of the welfare of nations perceive world problems, whose working out will determine the future of all peoples. Fundametally, I believe this war was made possible by the failure of men and women constituting great populations to insist upon the application, in respect to their economic [illegible] interests, of the simple Christian principles of mutual forbearance and co-operation which they avowed as a religious or social creed.

We have ourselves had the benefits of co-operation brought home to us by the necessities we have had to meet in the months since the European war broke out. Our financial and economic situation in the earlier part of 1914 was not all that could be desired. The gradual recovery from the strain of 1907 had been in a measure checked by a variety of forces. Then the whole industrial fabric was temporarily paralyzed by the sudden diversion of the great forces of trade and industry to the vast destruction of human life and of accumulated capital. The consequences were so tremendous, even for us, that there had to be co-opefation lest all should be destroyed.

As long ago as the panic of 1907 it had begun to be clear that the industrial and commercial interests of the United States had become too vast and too complex to be left in their old-time haphazard and disorganized condition without grave danger of recurrent crises and panics, probably each more severe than the last with the passage of the years. Some method of integration and co-ordination had become a necessity from the point of view of the public good.

Much has been done in the direction of industrial co-operation in this country. The most terrible waste possible is human waste. If industrial development has a place in the progress of civilization it should be organized upon a basis of elimination of preventable human waste. It should not be carried out along lines of unrestrained and cut-throat competition, which is itself hardly different, in many of its cardinal phases, from war itself.

The desire for organized efficiency has always been particularly strong in Americans, and possibly no other people has ever carried organization and efficiency in an individualistic sense farther than have we. Now it is dawning upon the clearest thinking of our citizens that there is still a higher kind of efficiency than that of competitive individualism—the efficiency of properly devised and safeguarded co-operation.

The proper application of those principles does not restrict, but rather increases the liberty of the individual. The security to the industrial worker, through co-operation, in respect to greater safety, shorter hours, more continuous employment, and a share in the increased profits which these conditions bring about, should certainly not be considered other than an increase of personal liberty. In industry, as with the individual, liberty is not so much a matter of freedom from restraint as it is the acquirement in increasing measure of the rewards of labor, both of the mind and of the hands, through intelligent and mutually helpful meeting and overcoming of the obstacles which must be met each day.

OBSERVATIONS ON CONVENTION

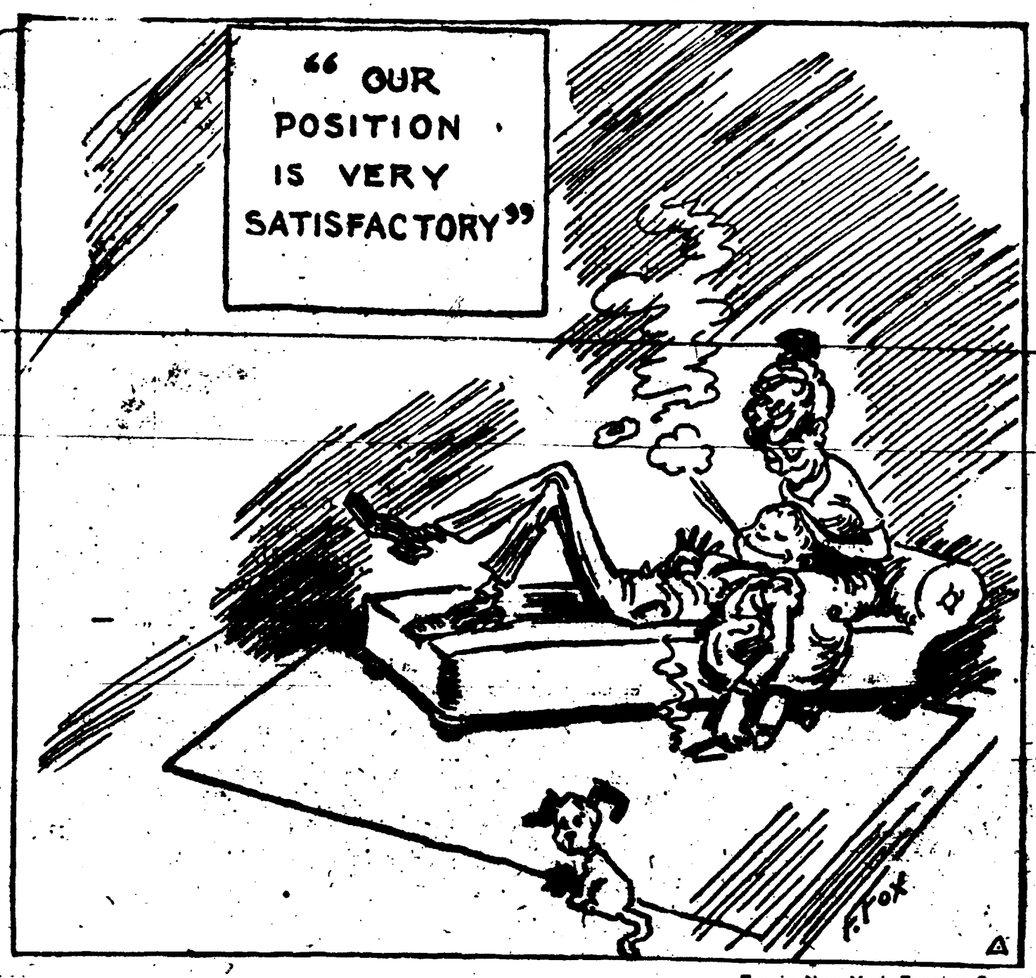
Secretary Hugo Notes Progress of Other States Toward Popular Rights

The approaching Constitutional Convention, which is to meet in Albany on the first Tuesday in April next, will be an event of supreme importance. As the proceedings in the convention held in the course of the last century and a quarter were of widespread importance to the country as well as to the people of the state, just so the meetings and discussions of the delegates to the coming convention promise to be of special interest to all citizens of this state who cherish its prosperity.

Constitutional revision on a comprehensive scale is a rather solemn responsibility, and there should never be occasion for haste. In the drafting of proposed amendments to the present Constitution the members of the coming convention will be called upon to consider the extreme democratic ideas which characterize some of the recent constitutions of the western and Southern States. They will quickly understand the difficulties experienced by these and other similar conventions as reflected in the efforts of their members to escape from some of the evils which are present in all state governments.

In addition to providing the framework of government, the qualifications of electors and the like, state constitutions should contain a guarantee of a few simple, well-established principles, lest in moments of excitement or under the temporary pressure of special interest they should be disregarded. Constitutions were not made to be codes of law, nor were they intended to embody the opinion of a momentary majority upon an entirely unsettled question. They should not attempt to be an exhaustive treatise on the organization of the various departments under it, but written and enacted in a form that the student of civil government in an elementary school may understand.

The new instrument should aim, first, at clearness and simplicity. Certainly, in one of the oldest states it would be deplorable to see an attempt to incorporate a body of statutes in the fundamental law, as has been done in some of the latest ones. The story of constitution making in Oklahoma and Arizona has not been an inspiring one, though it may hafe value in showing us what to avoid.



In Constitution making, however, it is important to remember that times change, that new things are invented, new devices, new schemes, new plans, new uses of corporate power, and that these changes are to go on hereafter for all time. For this reason, especially, it is important that while care should be taken to place proper restriction upon the legislature, at the same time it is equally important to leave what properly belongs to the field of legislation for future legislatures. As someone must be trusted, it is essential to trust to each branch of the legislature just what belongs to it in order that it may perform its proper legislative function.

Legislative restrictions have naturally given rise to the opinions often expressed that there is an increasing distrust in this country of representative institutions and that this is shown by the steadily growing number of constitutional restrictions upon the power of the legislature, by the prohibition of special legislation, by the adoption of biennial instead of annual sessions, and by the extension of home rule.

Nevertheless, looking at the whole field from another point of view, it will be realized that many provisions which seem to be at first considered as limitations upon the legislative, are nothing more than another method for increasing and equalizing the right of all. Thus, the provisions prohibiting the legislature from passing special laws whenever general laws are applicable are, after all, only checks upon the creation of monopolies and special privileges. Home rule properly considered is only an extension of the principle of self-government and not a restriction upon the Legislature. The substitution of biennial for annual sessions of the legislature is a recognition by the people of the fact that too much legislation, like too much medicine, may impede instead of promote their welfare.

BUREAUS TO HELP LABOR SITUATION

Plans Laid to Supply Farm Labor Where It is Required

A circular just received by the director of the Cornell agricultural experiment station tells of the co-operation between three of the federal departments—labor, agriculture and post office—in a plan for the employment and distribution of laborers in the United States. The post office department is working through its post masters, officers in charge of branch post offices, and rural mail carriers, and the department of agriculture through its field officers throughout the United States. The help of the agricultural experiment station is particularly requested in order that they may notify farmers and other employers of labor of the inauguration of this plan to furnish farm or other labor at all seasons of the year.

How the Plan Woks

In order that prospective employers and employes may avail themselves of the opportunities of the plan the following method is to be adopted: Blanks for the use of employers desiring help, and for persons seeking employment may be had, it is announced from postmasters, officers in charge of any branch postoffice, or from rural mail carriers. All such application blanks when filled out and signed are to be returned to the postmaster or other officer mentioned, and he will forward them to the department of labor where, it is promised, they will receive special and prompt attention. When these applications are returned through the postal authorities, no postage will be required. Future instructions will be issued by the departments concerned from time to time.

Purpose of The Plan

The purpose of the plan, as announced, is to supply labor where it is required in every section of the republic. Communications from the various federal officers concerning the necessity for workers in any given locality are especially desired. The department of labor states that farmers and other employers of labor should be apprised of the inauguration of the idea, and it is hoped that, as soon as the work undertaken becomes generally known, effective farm or other labor may be furnished at all seasons of the year.

COLLEGE DEFINES POSITION ON CO-OPERATION

In response to a number of queries as to the attitude of the State college of Agriculture on the subject of co-operative enterprises, a plan of procedure has just been formulated and announced by the Dean as follows:

As a first step the College is developing a rural community service, made up of several existing departments, such as those of farm [illegible] economics, and of rural economics, rural education, and rural engineering. The farm bureau organization also will co-operate in the work.

INVESTIGATION FIRST

The principal purposes of the work at the present time, according to Dean Galloway, will be to ascertain the facts as they have been brought out in various co-operative enterprises and organizations for the betterment of rural conditions—whether this betterment affects the farmer's income or his general welfare.

The work will be undertaken, it is said, as a scientific study of the reasons for successful co-operative enterprises and of the failure of unsuccessful ones, in which the facts will be corrolated, and deductions made from these facts before any definite recommendations are formulated. In other words, while it is the stated purpose of the college to apply its knowledge, it wants to be first sure of that knowledge, and to have the application keep behind rather than ahead of the facts.

While the College announces that it wishes to be able to advise individuals and groups how to apply the results of its inquiries, to problems of farm management, of market and exchange, and of community life, it must first be sure of its groundwork. The work is provided for in the law establishing the college, which provides that among its objects shall be "to determine better methods of handling and marketing farm products."

The college authorities make it plain, however, that under no circumstances, even when it has gathered a considerable amount of available material, will it or any of its agents take definite steps toward administering an organization or handling it any way the finances or business of a co-operative enterprise.

THE CASE OF LIME

Taking the case of lime for example, the soils experts of the college or the managers of the state farm bureaus say they may advocate the use of lime and may teach the farmer its value as a result of their research experience. They may say when lime should be applied and will tell what kind of lime would be the most advantageous under a given condition. Also, according to the college authorities, they might suggest that several farmers could advantageously combine in purchasing co-operatively their lime in order to secure low prices for carload lot shipments. At this point, however, according to the policy announced by the college, its functions will cease, and the casual correspondence to secure needed material and the handling of funds involved can not be advised upon or undertaken by anybody connected with the college.

FARM BUREAU MEN AT WORK

The county farm bureau managers, working in co-operation with the state college of agriculture, have already been called upon by members of farm bureau associations to help organize co-operative buying and selling. The farm bureau men have given helpful information, but they do not take part in the actual business. It is the intention, however, that as fast as information and experience of co-operative organizations are gathered that this shall be made available to farmers. Information will be given out either through farm bureau managers, through the rural and agricultural press, or through other agencies of the college.

PREDICT GERMAN RAID ON EASTER SUNDAY

Amsterdam, April 1.—During the past few days the sky above Holland has been thick with German airships, aeroplanes and hydro-aeroplanes, while the waters around Holland are sown with a cordon of war craft, as proved by reports from Dutch trawlers tand lshing smacks which have returned for the Easter holidays. There is every indication therefore that the recent German warning to await Easter Sunday was true. Germans are though to really intend another coup like the Hartlepool-Scarborough raid.

JESSE A. MORRILL LEADS POLL FOR C. OF C. DIRECTOR

Nine good men and true, representative men of the city, from all branches of business, were elected directors of the Chamber of Commerce last night. The voting started Monday and of the 301 members eligible to vote, 249 cast ballots, or 82 per cent. of the membership.

J. A. Morrill, one of the most prominent workers in the Chamber during the recent campaign, polled the majority of votes, totaling 217. He was closely followed by N. L. Whitaker, who polled 187. W. P. Morin, J. R. Sullivan, L. W. Emerick, J. C. O'Brien, I. Achilli, H. L. Paddock and W. A. Butts followed in the order named, making a total of nine. There were thirty-four candidates for the board and each member marked his ballot with a cross before the names of the nine men he wished as directors. Accordingly it will be seen that Mr. Morrill was chosen by almost every voter as he polled 217 out of 249 possible votes.

The interest evinced in the proceedings was cause for gratification to the members of the Chamber, Secretary Heydecker and R. P. Stoddard of the American City Bureau, who superintended the balloting.

The tellers, Messrs. Schem, Boland, McCully, Bogardus and Webb, commenced the work of counting the votes immediately after the polls closed at 7 o'clock. They finished their work about 8.30, and although a meeting of the Chamber had been planned for last night, it was postponed.

The results were as follows:

J. A. Morrill, 217; N. L. Witaker, 187; W. P. Morin, 173; J. R. Sullivan, 164; L. W. Emerick, 146; I. Achilli, 117; D. L. Lipsky, 78; J. C. O'Brien, 128; W. A. Butts, 92; H. L. Paddock, 107; E. J. Stranahan, 22; H. H. Bristol, 8; Geo. E. True, 7.

The nine directors were notified of their election this morning by Mr. Stoddard and they met at the Chamber rooms this afternoon at 5 o'clock to elect a president, and the other officers of the Chamber.

The Chamber will hold a meeting Tuesday evening, and at that time a speaker from Rochester will address the assembly. Mr. Stoddard stated this morning that he did not know atp resent whom the speaker will be but he will be announced as soon as the arrangements are completed. At the Tuesday night meeting the Chamber will "get down to brass tacks," as Mr. Heydecker expressed it, and the various suggestions received from the members for the betterment of the city and its industrial welfare will be given consideration.

MR. BUCK'S SERMON

Baptist Pastor Describes Christ's Life on Wednesday Before Crucifixion.

Rev. M. G. Buck of the First Baptist church addressed a large and deeply interested congregation last night on the subject "Wednesday of Holy Week." Mr. Buck described the Wednesday of the last week of Christ's life as the day on which Christ retired from His Apostles and followers and spent the day in prayer and reparation for the terrible sufferings of the next two days.

There will be a sermon tonight, and the Prudential committee will meet at 7.30 o'clock for the purpose of deciding on the candidate for baptism.

CITY GETS A. & P. BRANCH STORE

The Atlantic & Pacific Tea Company will open a store in this city Monday in the premises now occupied by Young, the undertaker. It was announced this morning that Mr. Young will commence moving immediately to his new location in the old post office building and the tea company agents stated today that their store will be open for business early next week. Whitaker and Bogardus, the local real estate agents, have had charge of the leasing of the store and, although negotiations were begun with the tea company some time ago, the final arrangements were not decided upon until this morning.

The A. and P. Company controls over 250 stores in the United States and they have placed one of their establishments in almost every city of note in the country. They handle a full line of groceries and food stuffs in addition to a large stock of teas and coffees. The manager of the Fulton store has not yet arrived in the city but he is expected this afternoon.

SUBSTATIONS ESTABLISHED

Substations for the new postoffice have been established thru the direction of Postmaster Conley. M. B. Hargraves' drug store in West Broadway and E. A. Putnam's drug store in Oneida street are the places named.

The arrangement is a great convenience to many people who would otherwise be obliged to walk a great distance in order to transact their postal affairs.

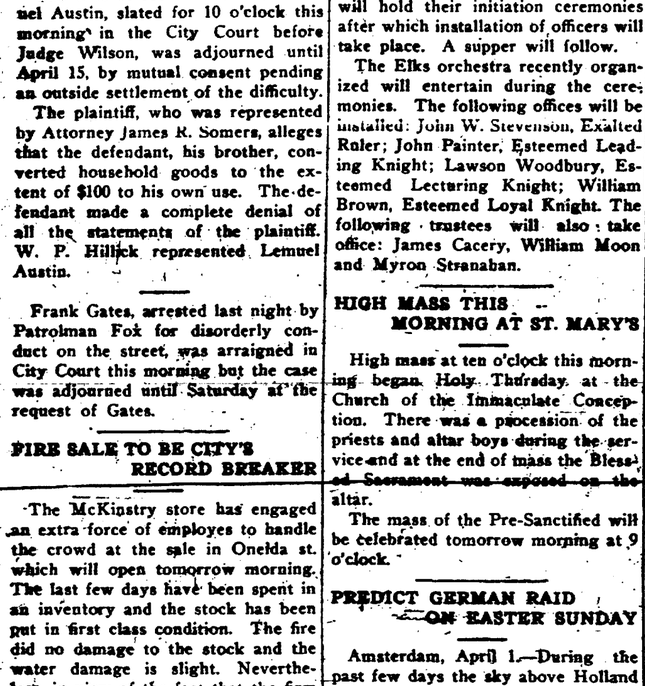
30 ARRESTS MADE IN MARCH

Twenty-five Resulted in Conviction in City Court—Fire Loss $3,000 for Month

The Board of Fire and Police Commissioners met last night in the City Hall in closed session, disposing of routine business for the month of March. Chief of Police Dyer and Chief Waugh of the fire department made reports of their departments, and aside from that no other business was transacted.

The report of the chief of police showed that 30 arrests were made during the past month as follows: Public intoxication, 12; assault in the third degree, 7; assault in the second degree, 1; grand larceny, 1; burglary, 1; disorderly conduct, 4; keeping a disorderly house, 2; violation of section 483 of the Penal Code, 1; violation of section 899 of the Penal Code, 1.

Twenty-five of the thirty arrests resulted in conviction, four cases were adjourned and one case was held for the Grand Jury. Fines amounting to $40 were imposed upon the offenders and half of that amount was collected.



Patrolmen's fees for civil service amounted to $6. There were nine calls for the patrol wagon. Officer Norton was allowed ten days' leave of absence during the month and officer Hartigan was allowed three days.

Fire Chief Waugh's report embraced eight alarms, seven of which were telephoned to the department and one received by the fire alarm system. The total loss aggregated $3000 and the greater part of that amount was covered by insurance.

LIBERTY BELL FOR SUFFRAGE

Great Bell to be Cast at Troy Today. To be Rung in November

New York, April 1.—The bell which by means of the telephone may ring the news of suffrage victory next November in three states, New York, Pennsylvania and Massachusetts, will be cast in Troy today. The women with whom the plan of this Liberty Bell No 2 originated, Mrs. Frank M. Roessing and Mrs. Katherine Wentworth Ruschenberger, of Pennsylvania, passed through this city yesterday on their way to Troy to see the casting done.

With them were Mrs. Wilfred Lewis, president of the Philadelphia Equal Franchise League; Mrs. G. A. Piersol, chairman of the Woman Suffrage party, of that city; Mrs. Mary Hutchenson Page, chairman of the Boston Suffragists' Executive Board, and several other women. Mrs. Martha Wentworth Suffren, vice-chairman of the New York City Woman Suffrage party, and Mrs. George Notman, chairman of the 11th Campaign District, met them at the Pennsylvania Station with decorated automobiles and took them to the party headquarters, at 48 East 34th st., where they had luncheon and speeches before going on to Troy.

Mrs. Roessing declared that the Pennsylvania women were so confident of success in November that they didn't hesitate for a moment about spending the money for this copy of the Liberty Bell of 1776.

"It is going to ring the completion of liberty in the United States, as the first liberty bell rang its creation," she said. "It will be a beautiful bell, made of the finest metal and exactly like the original one, only with a few words added to the inscription. The inscriptions will be 'Establish justice' and 'Secure the blessings of Liberty.' I believe it will make a great sensation and secure many converts to the cause when, mounted on a white motor truck. It is taken by slow degrees through Pennsylvania, escorted by a band of suffragists, to be mounted in Independence Square. Eventually we expect to take it to Washington, where we hope to build a tower, from the top of which it may hang."

Mrs. Raymond Brown, president of the New York State Woman Suffrage Association, told the visitors that she had made an unofficial canvass of hundreds of New York men, and they were all convinced that the suffragists would win in November.

"The managing editor of one of the great dailies told me the other day that most of the men in his office were for it," she said. "And that is typical. "The women want it; let them have it.' is what they say. It is noteworthy, too, that every publication in New York which caters to women is on the side of suffrage.

"But if we don't win in November the thing for us to do is to work for a federal amendment. Let us then get some of the weaker Western states, to have a lever with Congress and work for the enfranchisement of the women of the whole land."

Mrs. Ruschenberger, whose little neice Katherine Wentworth, will pull the lever which will release the flow of metal when the bell is cast, spoke, as did several of the visitors. Mrs. Carrie Chapman Catt accompanied them to Troy.

"YOU QUIT KIDDIN'," SAYS GIRL TO PRESIDENT.

Miss Mary Tumulty, eldest daughter of the president's secretary, was thirteen years old March 25. That night the Tumulty telephone rang, and Miss Mary was called. When she said "Hello!" a voice on the other end of the wire replied:

"You quit kiddin'," said Miss Mary. "You can't fool me."

"Why, this is the president," the voice replied. "I trust you do not object to me calling you on the phone. I merely wanted to congratulate you."

Mr. Tumulty appeared and immediately assured his daughter she was not being "kidded," but was really talking with the president of the United States, and then Miss Mary dropped the receiver, trembling.

MINE SWEEPERS SHOW CONTEMPT FOR PERIL.

A young American who recently signed for service as a member of the crew of a mine sweeper sends the following account of one of his trips out into the North sea:

"'Order—You proceed at once to —— and will sweep the area marked on the accompanying chart.' This was the order which sent us hammering into the head seas of a lively wind on a bitterly cold Sunday morning at 4 o'clock. It takes a tight vessel to survive the welter and smother which rise so quickly in these waters. In the winter months, especially, the work goes on amid conditions of great severity, and our ships frequently keep the sea as mine sweepers when as trawlers they would flee to the shelter of their harbors.

"Our ship is one of the best of her stanch type, and she reeled along wonderfully on that Sunday morning. Somewhere in the darkness to starboard there showed through the whirling snow the lights of another vessel running on the same course as ourselves, and at the same speed. The dawn came up and showed her to be kin to us and the signals at once made clear that in her we beheld our sweeping partner. There arises a curious respect for her. She must know quite well that at any moment her plunging bows may meet a mine and then there would be a vacancy at her end of the drag tackle and vacancies in little cottages in the isles.

"Fifteen hours of drenching and buffeting were our portion that day. The vessel, with the pull of the tackle and the drive of her engines keeping her down like a half tide rock, was never clear of the sweeping seas. Thud, slap, crash, swish, they came over her bows and swirled along the deck, never ceasing their constant assault.

"When the snow passed there was a glimpse of sun. Then the wind backed against the sun and came down on us in wild gusts, icy cold. As the afternoon wore on the cold increased, and just before nightfall came a strange lull which let in biting frost. The hardy fellows on board were stiff and numb before the day was done, and when the gear was slipped and shipped nobody was sorry.

"The disposal of the mines recovered depends upon their character and the circumstances of their recovery. Frequently our gunners explode them by firing into them from the deck."

VETERAN TIRED OF WAR.

Major C. Page Johnson, a retired officer of the United States army and a veteran of Indian and the Spanish-American war, who returned from Europe on the Holland-American liner Nieuw Amsterdam, said that the war was such awful slaughter on both sides that the government at Washington ought to take steps to stop it for the cause of humanity.

"Once war was a profession for gentlemen," the major said, "but now it is not a profession, but a business for slaughterers. Along the battle front 2,000,000 men have been drawn up facing each other since the fall and will remain under the severe tension until May. Murderous machines are dealing death to thousands daily of both armies in the field. Germany is formidable in the faith of her people that her cause is just. Her women are brave and show wonderful spirit. It is difficult to foretell what the end of the conflict will be."

Said to Have Dropped Below the 2,000,000 Mark.

In consequence of the war the population of Berlin (exclusive of the suburban towns) has again dropped below the 2,000,000 mark, which it had crossed several years ago. The population at the beginning of January was returned at 1,982,154, which signifies a loss of 97,060 for the year.

This loss, however, does not take account of the men who have gone into the war, who are still counted as present; it seems to be due mostly to the removal of working people to the suburbs and to more distant districts.

EXPLOSION AT SOLVAY PLANT

Several Workmen Injured In Explosion in Acid Factory Last Night

The Semet-Solvay plant was the scene of a terrific explosion at six o'clock last night. Gas in the carbolic acidfactory ignited and the huge building was wrecked.

Eighteen men were injured as a resule of the explosion. Charles Crippen and Patrick O'Neil were seriously injured, Crippen was blown thru a window and against a box car standing outside. Several bones were broken and he was badly burned and injured internally. Patrick O'Neil was badly burned. Both were removed to St. Joseph's hospital where their condition today was not greatly improved.

The force of the explosion blew the entire roof from the building, crumbled portions of the walls to powder and shook housess and building thruotu the village of Solvay and Syracuse. Startled residents in all parts of the city immediately called police officials and newspaper offices to find out the extent of life lost and damage done, and thousands of persons poured into Solvay to visit the scene of what they believed would be a frightful disaster.

The Solvay Process police station was turned into a temporary hospital. Eight men were taken to St. Joseph's hospital and eight were taken to the Crouse-Irving hospital.

The plant was of light construction and to this is attributed the fact that no lives were lost. Had the walls been thicker it is possible none would have escaped with hteir lives.

Officials of the Semet-Solvay Company were unanimous last night in attributing the cause of the explosion to gas which had in all probability escaped through leaks in retorts or containers. They declared that no explosives are used or manufactured in plant, and that as far as could be ascertained upon a hasty examination of the place the sole causee of trouble lay in the formation of an explosive gas of which the workmen were unaware.

Whether or not smoking or sparks ignited the gas or whether it was purely a case of spontaneous combustion, they were unable to state. The carbolic plant has been recently reconstructed and manufacture of this acid resumed afer a lapse of several years. Machinery and stills used in the process are new and, it was admitted, not completely tested out by time.

Probably twentyfive men were at work in the building when the explosion occurred, as far as could be ascertained. Of this number six or seven were uninjured and went to their homes immediately.

The force of the s hock was felt for a radius of seven miles from Solvay. Hundreds of people, relatives of the working imen and others flocked to the scene. The injured men were carried from the wrecked building. Exaggerated reports were gradually cleared up and the crowd gradually cleared away.

The remainder of the plant did not cease operation. None of the apparatus in the wrecked building was seriously damaged.

MINUTES IN MANHATTAN

By Gotham Knickerbocker

New York, April 1.—When the murder of the gambler, Herman Rosenthal, at the behest of a police lieutenantt, lifted the veil from the New York underworld, it disclosed a seething and violent mass of feuds of a semi-political nature. This wild gang world of new York was not a new thing then, and the execution of Becker's four young gangsters did nothing to blot it out.

As an instance, I cite the curious case of Michael A. Rofrano, guarded from death against his will.

Mr. Rofrano is a city official, a member of the Street Cleaning Department, drawing a salary of $5,000 a year. He is an able lawyer, and has offices at 198 Broadway, considered in the business and financial world of New York an excellent address.

"Good morning, Mr. Rofrano, I am assigned to you," said the stranger.

"Oh, I can take care of myself. You needn't bother."

"Those are my orders."

"Well, then, come along."

All through the day Detective Franklin, an expert underworld sleuth, followed the $5,000 a year city official. He accompanied him to his doorstep at night. This went on day after day. Sometimes Franklin's side partner relieved him, but Mr. Rofrano could not go out without being guarded. Finally, he grew so annoyed that he complained to Captain Deevy, Franklin's superior. Deevy was courteous, but firm. Rofrano must be guarded.

"But I'm not afraid of anybody," protested Rofrano. He went higher—to the second deputy police commissioner, who is in charge of detectives.

Same result. Same result, too, when he finally arrived at the police commissioner himself. The latter simply paid a call to District Attorney Perkins—and the guard continued.

What's the solution? Oh, it's just the little game of politics, as it's played in good old Manhattan. Mr. Rofrano has dared to dispute the Democratic leadership of the second Assembly district with Big Tom Foley, ex-Sheriff. Result: Three murders in a year, a thousand and one debates on the subject with fists, bricks and other persuasives, and so lively a time that if it occurred in any American city of 25,000 population the whole Nation would watch it. But it's buried in New York's great lower East Side. Indeed, its a big section and the half million people on the East Side don't know anything about it.

When in New York look out for the gyps. Don't know what a gyp is? Well, you don't have to fear them unless you attempt to purchase a second hand automobile. Then watch your step.

The gyps are the direct descendants of the old time horse traders. Their tricks are as many as those of the traveling gypsy who would doctor a wheezing, knock-kneed, descript nag to look like a young thoroughbred.

The motor car gyp can also accomplish temporary miracles. Under his deft fingers worn cylinders and pistons are suddenly brought together and compression seems nearly perfect. Gears that have shrieked and rattled begin to purr like a well fed cat, and the victim gets a "demonstration" that is highly satisfactory.

A gyp sees, for instance, a fairly good looking touring car of the vintage of 1911 in the hands of a dealer. "How much?" he asks. "I'll sell for $650," but after a good bit of dickering the dealer makes it $500. "I think it'll just suit a friend of mine," says Mr. Gyp.

Looking over the classified newspapers ads the next day, we see: "Private party compelled to sell his car (1914), cost $4,000, for $1,000; all equipment; just like new. See Gyp, Hotel Pluto." "Must be all right if he lives in that hotel," the bargain hunter argues. He finds the gyp in a low priced hotel room. "Oh, yes," said the gyp. "I have to give up my car. I'm funny about such things—always wanting a new car. My chauffeur keeps them in perfect condition, but I have to get a new one every spring." And so on and so forth.

Gyps often hire private garages or stables in the districts inhabitated by the wealthy. It is known that a gyp has gone as far as Plainfield, N. J., in hiring a private garage to give an air of genuineness to the claim of a private sale.

As to "doping" them, graphite mixed with cedar sawdust is used to tame the worn gears in a transmission or differential, while a very heavy lubricating oil or a mixture containing wax will fill the spaces between piston and cylinder and bring compression almost up to normal.

JOHNSON'S 37TH YEAR PASSED

He Celebrated by Taking Life Easier—Women Interested in Coming Fight

Jess Willard will have a whirlwind boving campaign with his sparring partners in the next two days. The challenger for the highest fistic honors in thhe world will go through 20 rounds of fast work each day and the pogramme for Friday is twenty ounds of sparring. On Sunday, he will box only four or five rounds so as not to become muscle bound and practically quit active training. The big cow boy is also reducing his road work and beginning tomorrow he will only plod along for a couple of miles instead of eight or ten as he has been doing.

Physicians who have examined Willard say he is in marvelous condition. Willard himself is confident of victory. He hopes to land a right swing early in the fight, but declared today that he will not take any chances of landing this blow, but will fight cautiously.

Jack Johnson did very little work yesterday. The big smoke was 37 years old yesterday and made the day one of ccelebration instead of hard work in the training camp. The champion figures that he will quit training on Friday. What work he did yesterday was more for the entertainment of his friends. He boxed 12 roounds with his sparring partners and did a little road work. On Friday he will box 10 rounds and then knock off hard work. It is figured that if Monday, the day of the fight is a sunny one, Johnson will have the edge on Willard, owing to the fact that the champion has been working out under a blistering sun in an uncovered arena, while Willard has been doing his taining in the shaded yarden of the hotel.

George Monroe, former bantam champion, who saw Johnson before he fouyht Jeffries, Flynn and Moran says that the champion's condition is perfect. His speed is bewildering says Munroe. His muscles are hardened to a point where they will resist any blow to the body. His jaw is the strongest of any man's in the world and able to resist even the terrific wallops of Willard.

It is rumored that Johnson must shift his lghting plans and instead of waiting for Willard to come to him, will rush the big cowboy off his feet right at the start.

Women are taking a keen interest in the fight, and it is said that between 700 and 800 of the fair sex will witness the bout.

There is plenty of Johnson money in sight, but his backers are refusing to warger any of their money at the prevailing odds, saying they are prohibitive. They insist that the odds should be more than two to one and won't bet any money at anything over that figure.

BOXERS GETTING TOO MUCH PAY

By FRANK G. MENKE

It is about time for the prize fight fans to stop being boobs—and to stop their present practice of submitting so tamely to the hold-up game that is being carried on by the prize fight promotor, the prize fight manager and the prize lghter.

The practice of gouging the public for from $1 to $10 for the privilege of watching a couple of low brow, lazy youths perform for about 30 minutes so that these athletics may be assured of from $2,000 to $4,000 for about 30 minutes of so called "work" is revolting to an extreme degree. And the practice should be abolished.

If the fans fose up and refused to pay those prices, the lghters very soon would be willing to lght at whatever price they could get. And then the fight fans could dictate the terms. They could refuse to pay more than from 25 cents to $1 for the best seats at even an all-star bout. That would mean only from $200 to $500 for the stars. Quite a drop from $4,00 and $6,000—but those stars would be mighty glad to get even $200.

Freddie Welsh, in his first year as lightweight champion of the world will draw down over $100,000. Think of it! A salary larger than that given to the President of the United States an income eight times larger than that of any of our cabinet officiers and from five to 50 thimes greater than that earned by many doctors, lawyers and other professional men.

Welsh will have fought—or rather appeared—in about 20 battles before June-time that marks the first anniversary of his elvation to the lightmeight throne. Those 20 battles each will be for about 30 minutes duration. That means that during the year the Briton will have worked exactly 12½ hours in the prize ring. And for that "work" he draws down between $7,500 and $80,000. The other money that makes up his income for the year comes from theatrical and newspaper work.

It is something of a blot on the intelligence of the civilized world that a prize fighter who couldn't earn $900 a year at any other job, can milk the public for from $50,000 to $100,000 a year simply because he can hit a little harder blow or run from danger faster than the next fellow.

The prize fighting element, as a general rule, is made up of a lot of youths who are too lazy and too shiftless to learn some regular trade or profession. That spells work for them—and work is not what they want. They want soft and easy living without going to any trouble to secure it. So they turn to pride fighting.

And it is the men who work—and work hard—that makes it possible for those p[illegible] fighters to shirk work.

The [illegible]s are made up of work[illegible]. Their wives don't wear diamonds. Their family don't ride around in automobiles. But the wife of the fighter usually is bedecked with diamonds and the majority of the top notch prize fighters have from one to three automobiles.

Welsh is not the only instance. The fighting world is full of instances. Ad Wolgast made about $300,000 in the ring. So did Battling Nelson. Leach Cross has amassed a fortune. Willie Ritchie has drawn down around $250000. Jack Johnson got nearly $200,000 as his divy from the Jeffries fight. Jess Willard has grabbed down a fortune in the ring. So has Gunboat Smith. Knockout Brown who hardly knew how to write his own name, and who never was even a near champion got nearly $200,000 while the getting was good. Johnny Kilbane has made about $150,000 in the ring.

And so it goes.

Look over the entire list of prize fighters of the past, and present and you won't find five out of the entire lot that could have averaged $1,200 a year in salary in any trade or profession. Yet they have grabbed from $50,000 to $400,000 in the prize ring.

And the fight fan, because he submits to the hold-up, at the box office, has made all this possible.

About Sports Generally

By Frank G. Menke

Havana, April 1.—Jack Johnson, declared he had $10,000 ready to bet on himself, if he could secure odds of 1½ to 1 or 1¾ to 4. He asserted that the prevailing odds were unfair because Jess Willard has the edge on him in size, age and reach.

The general opinion here is that Johnson will win unless the fight goes more than 20 rounds. In that case, the negro's age will count against him.

The fight promoters are making an organized campaign to stimulate interest in the battle and their efforts are making for success, though as yet the public is not engaging in any wild scramble for the seats that range in price from $5 to $25.

The Cubans know a lot about baseball and bull fighting. They pay out real money and pay it out freely to see such affairs, but they don't know much about the pugilistic game. It is something new for them and they aren't quite sure they are going to get their money's worth if they go to see the Johnson-Willard match.

One thing is certain and that is unless the coming Americans grab off the bulk of the high priced seats there will be a lot unsold when the fight begins.

The average Cuban might be influenced to loosen up to the extent of $3 or $5 to see the fight but he won't go farther.

Of course the high officials of the Cuban Government and some millionaire Cubans will occupy the high priced seats, but their numbers are small—probably 500 at the outside.

The promoters of the fraces assert that the gate receipts will exceed those of the Johnson-Jeffries fight.

The Johnson-Jeffries receipts totaled around $237,000. The receipts for this fight, according to present indications, will not total much over $100,000. They will be much less if it would rain or be cold the day of the fight.

The seating capacity of the Oriental race track, in which the fight is to be staged, is shrouded in mystery and contradictions. The statements of the various men connected with the bout vary widely as to what the capacity really is.

"We can accommodate from 60,000 to 100,000," said Dick Clegin, managing director of the fight.

"We will have accommodations for about 30,000," said Jack Curley, promoter-in-chief.

"The seating capacity of the park is 19,000," said Tom Jones, manager for Willard.

"There are 10,000 unreserved and 16,500 reserved seats at the park," said E. A. Rosenthal, secretary of the syndicate promoting the fight.

Race track officials state that the normal seating capacity of the park is between 15,000 and 20,000.

On the basis of 10,000 standing room tickets at $3 each and 15,000 to 20,000 seats with an average price of $8, it would be seen that if the park is crowded to its fullest capacity the receipts will not go much over $150,000. Probably 1,500 or 2,000 Americans will see the fight. A few are here already, the others will arrive later in the week. A contingent is coming from New Orleans on a chartered boat. It is expected that the New York boats will bring about 700 fight fans. Several hundred are expected via [illegible].

About 100 Americans who are coming from the [illegible] near here will send 50 Americans who are living there.

He is the only Scranton lad who will be taken on the training trip by Manager Mike O'Neill. He goes along as a pitcher.

BRIDGE WILL BE BUILT

Volney and Oswego Towns Vote to Raise $23,000 Each

Minetto, March 31.—The Minetto bridge bonding proposition was approved by the taxpayers of the towns of Volney and Oswego at a special election held Tuesday. The question was the raising of $23,000 in bonds by each town as its share of the bridge construction cost. The total vote in Oswego Town was 123, of which 72 were affirmative and 51 negative; in Volney the vote was 103 of which 60 were in favor and 43 opposed.

There is a bill in the Legislature to appropriate $50,000 as the State's share in the cost of the bridge. The county of Oswego will also raise $23,000 as its share. This will make a total of $119,000, as the cost of the structure. This does not include that part of the bridge over the barge canal near the west side. The State will also be called upon to build this section and it will be paid for by the State out of the barge canal funds.

The new bridge will be of concrete steel type after designs made by William Meuser of the Concrete Steel Engineering Company of New York. The design, location, type and size of the bridge were decided on at a special election held last December. It was then decided to build a concrete steel bridge, twenty feet wide, 600 feet south of Benson avenue.

GERMANS RULE AIR IN POLAND; CORRESPONDENT VISITS A CAMP

Crack Corps Located In Vodka Factory—Watching Troop Movements Tries Nerves.

"The Humming Bird," New Kind of Machine, Rises Quickly Out of Danger.

Of all the nice fellows who are dying for their kaiser the finest are the fliers. So I welcomed an invitation to ride out and visit a German aviation camp in Poland and have a look at the men and machines that got on the nerves of Warsaw, says a staff correspondent of the New York Times, writing from a vodka factory in Poland. Half a dozen Aviatik biplanes were out tuning up on the ideal flying field, as big as Hempstead plains (a good landing place is a rarity in Poland, I was told). A dozen big square tents for hangars and machine shops had been pitched in the shadow of a big red brick factory, a solitary vodka distillery, which the Germans have converted into their "aero club."

"Morituri te salutamus!" said Captain D., the squadron commander, by way of welcome, extending the freedom of the reformed "clubhouse," about which he told one of war's little comedies.

"The Russians left so fast that they left all their vodka behind. When a Russian does that you can imagine he's going some," Captain D. explained in good American. It turned out that he has a brother in America, who teaches school in Kents Hill, Me., and I was to let him know that his flying brother when last seen was well and winning medals. Three Cossacks of more heroic mold, however, had stayed behind for a last drink, and yet another, until their escape was cut off by the storming Germans.

"They hid up the chimneys and were not discovered until we happened to build fires, when they were literally 'smoked out.' They are now in our ethnographical collection in Germany."

To an American the sight of that abandoned vodka was more convincing than all of the official bulletins of the great general staff—mute evidence of the finish of a grand offensive. "It enjoys complete immunity; it isn't even fit for motor fuel," the flying squadron chief laughed.

Captain D. and his fliers were manifestly an all star aggregation, for they all wore the iron cross of the first [illegible] when I tried to get a first story from the men who had "Warsaw" they, with [illegible] unanimity, suggested "interviewing Icarus."

Icarus, the Flying Dachshund.

The modest hero of a hundred flights posed beside a big biplane long enough to be photographed, but resisted all journalistic advances with a negative quiver of his supersensitive tail—for I had met Icarus, the death defying dachshund, the kaiser's only air dog. No one could financially induce Flieger Abteilung No. X to part with their little black and tan mascot. They consider him a "lucky dog" very literally, for their squadron has had only two casualties in six months of aerial war, an astounding record, while on one occasion he helped to save his flying companions from death or captivity. Outwardly this dog of war, who has had experiences and birdseye views that no truthful correspondent can boast of—Cossack patrols no bigger than mice scampering over the landscape, shrapnel bursting in woolly clouds around him, a panic stricken populace fleeing for cover—looks no different from any other well regulated, elongated dachs, most unlike a hero. But I had an opportunity of noting his iron nerve and happy fatalism, for at my urgent request the "daredevil dachshund" was allowed to give an exhibition flight. Throughout the photographing and attempted interviewing process Icarus had worn the bored expression of his breed, but yelped joyously when he was lifted into the tonneau of the Aviatik and strapped in beside the observer, after first having been warmly wrapped up by a sergeant mechanic, as the winter air was biting cold.

"Has he dropped bombs over Warsaw?" I asked, scenting the best canine interest story of the war. But Germans are irritatingly truthful. His little paws, they explained, weren't strong enough to pull the chain that releases the bombs suspended from the bottom of the car and simultaneously sets the clockwork mechanism going. He was purely an interested looker-on and giver of moral support, helping to make history by providing comic relief for nerves that are strained to the breaking point.

While the principal protagonist was off on his aerial "joy ride" Lieutenant von H., the tallest of the kaiser's fliers whom I have seen, six feet three and a modest, boyish looking hero, told of their closest shave.

Narrow Escape From Cossacks.

"We were coming back from a successful reconnoissance when two squadrons of Cossacks saw us and began peppering away at us at an altitude of about 2,000 meters. We were shot through the benzine tank, and when the motor stopped things didn't look promising. We volplaned to earth and made a good landing, but unfortunately didn't have time to cut our machine on fire—the Cossacks were coming. We just 'beat it' and hid in a swamp. However, we made some further useful observations of a big troop movement, for we heard Russian columns passing all night long. We had lost our bearings, but the next morning my observer, Lieutenant G., who is a hunter, saw some wild ducks on the wing and said, 'They'll be going south.' We remained hidden all that day, and at night followed the ducks fifteen kilometers to the Russian lines, behind which we had landed. We let this blessed pup lead the procession and successfully slipped through the Russian lines under cover of a dense fog at dawn." For this exploit Lieutenants H. and G. wear the iron cross, first class, pinned on their left breasts. The second class, by the way, is worn on a white edged black silk ribbon in the buttonhole, and it is considered rather good form to tuck the cross out of sight inside the uniform, leaving only the ribbon showing. The superdachs drew a blank, dogs not being eligible for decoration.

Icarus, however, proved to have other accomplishments besides being able to fly and outwit Cossacks, and when he returned to earth he was put through his repertory of war tricks, of which the best were these: "Franzos," said his tutor. Icarus wagged his tail and showed no hard feelings. "Russ." Icarus keeled over and "played dead." "Englander" (English). Icarus howled dismally.

"Echt Deutsch—he's every inch a German," said the captain seriously, patting his 'anti-English' pupil, while the others watched the performance in a grim jawed circle. It was not a joke, but a ritual. Beyond this bleak, wind swept Polish plain they saw the mirage of a hated island.

Through the courtesy of the great general staff I had been able to tell fully everything of interest about German military aviation. I had seen it in France, but the Germans always have something new to show you every time you come around.

New Type of Aeroplane.

I learned that "Taubes Over Warsaw" is not technically a truthful headline, as none have flown over Warsaw any more than over Paris, the Taube being a superannuated monoplane model. In the east, as in the west, the Germans pin their faith to the Aviatik biplanes, but with their genius for specialization they have, since the war taught the necessity for it, developed a new military model for "certain special work"—a baby monoplane—which I was permitted to see in action. It is not a Taube, but a "humming bird," and it beats the biplane by some miles an hour. But its crowning military merit is its ability to hop off the ground quickly and climb fast at a steep angle. The limit of prudence for an aeroplane making observations is an altitude of 6,000 feet, but with the increased experience in shooting at aeroplanes even this height is no longer as safe as is desirable. Moreover, while you can make satisfactory observations from 6,000 feet under favorable weather conditions, you have got to go lower down into the danger zone at other times, particularly here in Poland, when there is "snow in the air." Then you won't see anything if you are higher up than, say, 3,000 feet. Here is where the fast "climber" comes in handy. You can do your observing at lower altitudes and head for the upper regions the moment you are in danger of being potted. Again, cunningly concealed batteries can only be spotted, as a rule, from low altitudes, and here, too, the swift darting "humming bird" comes in handy. The trial flight which I witnessed was astounding.

More interest, of a different kind, attached to the squadron's "lieblingsapparat," or favorite machine, which I was invited to inspect. I didn't know why, for it looked like all other German biplanes I had ever seen, as if it had just come out of the factory. Their machines are groomed like race horses. Inquiry showed, however, that the lieblingsapparat well deserved a place in the history of aeroplaning. It was a veteran of six months' standing, had been in action from the first day of the war and was going yet, had flown 8,000 kilometers with never an accident, had paid seven visits to Warsaw and been hit seventy times. The closest shot was within two inches of the vital water cooler. Each "treffer" or shot that hit the mark, on wing and body, had a small red ring, painted around it, with the date marked in small black letters, while on one side of the car or body the aviators had painted a skeleton map of the eastern theater of war, and an accurate diagram, in different colors, of all the heights which the lieblingsapparat had successfully negotiated, including the bomb dropping visits to Warsaw—a unique historical document, for in addition to the varicolored routes there was a most methodical "index" giving the dates of flights and names of aviators who performed them. Its present pilot is Corporal Huckler, the star flier of the squadron, and who is said to hold the record for Warsaw flights.

Odd Happenings In the War News

The German admiralty has ordered its submarines to be careful about steamers leaving Havre for England because they may have German prisoners of war on board.

The rich of Germany are leaving their country in large numbers, responding to a government appeal that there shall be fewer people to feed while the war continues.

Copenhagen reports that the crown prince of Germany has been killed by one of the members of his suit. Since then the report says the kaiser has doubled his bodyguard. This is about the twenty-fifth time the crown prince has been murdered in dispatches.

Submarine catching is now the great game of the British admiralty. Stout wire netting, the meshes in it five feet square, has been sunk in the channels frequented by German submarines far enough down not to touch ordinary vessels. Miles of it have been sunk.

Some of the German prisoners taken in France in recent weeks were wounded with a new instrument of warfare the French are employing. This is a small metal box filled with a strong explosive and about twenty shrapnel balls. The box is thrown by hand into the opposing trenches, where it is exploded by a fuse.

SUBNORMAL RACE IN EUROPE AFTER WAR.

Brain Loss Due to Shock More Serious Than Wounds.

Europe will be peopled with a race of subnormal men after the war, according to Miss Amy Rowland, aid to Dr. George W. Crile, noted surgeon, of Cleveland. Miss Rowland arrived in New York on board the Arabic of the White Star line, from Liverpool, and goes to join Dr. Crile, who also returned recently from the front, where he was connected with the American Ambulance hospital.

"Of the thousands of soldiers examined by Dr. Crile," Miss Rowland said, "every one evinced evidences of a permanent loss of brain power. The fright and shock they had suffered had impaired the brain tissue and in some cases had made idiots of them.

"The thousands of cripples who will be foisted on the suffering countries when the war ends will not by any means be the most serious consequences of the conflict. Dr. Crile found that in the cases of all the soldiers examined.

"In addition to the mental effect which will make those men subnormal for the balance of their lives Dr. Crile conducted researches into the physical effect of shock and fright on the human body. Previously the surgeon had made examinations of the effects of the same sensations on animals, a work which is widely known to the medical profession. It was found that in every case the effects of the sensations on men and animals are identical. There is an impairing of the nervous force, besides the gross physical effect."

SUNDAY GOLF FOR WISCONSIN

Ban on Movies Also Lifted in Blue Law Amendment.

Official recognition will be given to Sunday golf in Wisconsin by the proposed amendment to the blue laws, which will lift golf from the list of proscribed Sunday sports and which will make formally legal some of the amusements which were not dreamed of when the Wisconsin Sunday laws were passed.

The Heim bill, amending the blue laws, provides that moving picture theaters can be considered exempt from the list of things forbidden on Sunday, and another amendment has been cast in by the committee which exempts golf and baseball and other sports as long as they do not disturb the peace of a community.

BET ON A LONG WAR.

One of the most famous betting books in London is a musty volume wherein members of the Brooks club have recorded for more than a century and a quarter their wagers upon all sorts of questions, including the duration of a war or the fall of a ministry. The last bet appearing in its pages is £50 to £5 that the present war will be over before five years.

Among earlier entries, when odds were laid and taken upon the duration of the war with the American colonies and the outcome of the struggle with France, the name of Charles James Fox continually appears.

CANAL WIRELESS FINISHED.

Station Is the Largest and Most Powerful In the World.

The new wireless station in the Panama canal zone, which is the largest and most powerful in the world, has been completed. The Panama station is one of five great stations that will make it possible for the navy department to keep in communication with warships in all parts of the Atlantic and Pacific. The station will be manned and controlled by the navy.

An idea of the great range of the new station may be had when it is stated that it will be able to communicate with the wireless station in the Brooklyn navy yard, with the naval and army stations in Alaska, with the Strait of Magellan and with any point in Europe where a wireless plant is maintained.

REGIMENT ADOPTS A BABY.

Turkish Infant, Deserted by Parents, Is Baptized In Greek Church.

"Our regiment has adopted a two-year-old Turkish girl baby," writes a Cossack who is serving with the Russian advance into the Turkish Caucasus. He explains:

"During our forward movement one of our men found in a farmhouse this baby, which had been abandoned by her fleeing parents. The starving little creature was cleaned, clothed and fed and then taken to the staff quarters. In the Greek church of the village of Bardus the foundling was christened according to the rites of the orthodox church, the commander of the regiment acting as godfather and Princess Golovatina, a Red Cross nurse and wife of a member of the duma, as godmother. The child was named Alexandra Donskaia, after the name of the regiment.

"The officers and men of the regiment subscribed monthly amounts sufficient to pay for rearing and educating their regimental daughter."

Which Was the Worse?

"When I returned from our card party last night my wife just looked at me. Not a word was spoken."

"My wife looked at me, too, and I don't believe that a word was unspoken."—Houston Post.

4,200 CHARACTERS ON NEW TYPEWRITER

Chinese Machine Has Three Keys With 50,000 Combinations.

New York.—Stenographers may be interested to learn that there is a new sort of typewriter which has just been invented by a young student in the engineering department of New York university. The machine is different from the typewriters familiar to the average person in several respects. For instance, the "standard" keyboard has twenty-six letters and in most cases about a dozen keys devoted to figures and punctuation marks, while the new machine has 4,200 characters in all and only three keys.

One of the three keys is a back spacer, another the space key and the third is the key with which the 4,200 characters are struck. It is possible, according to the inventor, to make more than 4,200 characters by combinations of "radicals," or base characters. About 50,000 combinations can be made by the machine, the inventor said.

That stenographers ambitious to operate the new typewriter will find at first their task a little difficult, at least, was indicated by the fact that it required two hours to write the first letter typed by the machine. This letter contained approximately 100 words, but the operator was unfamiliar with the 4,200 characters. Stenographers of this city who do not work in export or import houses dealing with China, however, are not apt to be called on to memorize the new keyboard for some time.

The machine is said to be the first Chinese typewriter ever invented. Hsuen Chi, the student inventor, demonstrated the method by which the machine worked. He conceived the idea that a typewriter could be made to write Chinese while he was at his home in southern China three years ago, he said. He began a study of the Chinese dictionary at once to isolate the "radical" or base characters of the words. In most cases one character represents a whole word in Chinese, though, according to Hsuen Chi, thousands of these characters are made up of simpler characters which alone represent words themselves. He continued studying the forms of the language during a year and a half he spent at London university and began work on his typewriter.

Hsuen came to this country as a government student and on the prompting of Chinese officials who had become interested in his scheme took up the study of engineering at New York university and continued to work on the invention. He completed the model a short time ago and has patented it in this country, China and Japan, for it also writes Japanese, which, he said, is similar to Chinese.

FRANCE IMPROVES MATCHES.

Paris.—For forty years France has endured the worst matches in the world uncomplainingly because the government took the monopoly, manufacturing cheap and selling dear, as one means of paying the German war debt.

Now, however, big, cheap wooden matches, easy to strike, have replaced the sulphur tipped splinters that nearly choked unwary smokers or obstinately refused to light.

The newspapers do not chronicle the reform or its reason.

TWO AUSTRIAN REGIMENTS CAPTURED IN BIG BATTLE

London, April 1.—Frederick Rennet, correspondent of the Daily News at Petrograd, telegraphs:

"It is only from the new Russian base across the line of Uszok, Lupkow and Bartfeld that the substantial beginnings of the spring campaign are visible. The Russian column moving into Hungary along the Ondava River captured two full regiments and a field battery. The Austrians now are bringing large reinforcements from the south, and the first stages of a battle engaging great numbers now is developing.

"The Germans in the nnorth are covering the period until fresh corps arrive from the west by restless, futile raids. The enemy's exasperation at the steady crushing of its Niemen campaign is unmeasured."

General Below's artillery has been evacuating its positions to the northwest of Osowetz for several days. At one time twenty batteries were shelling the outer sector of the fortress, but now only four remain, and even they are quiescent."

YALE MAN FOUND; MIND IN A DAZE

New Haven, April 1.—While seven hundred undergraduates, the entire New Haven police and detective force and a large number of relatives were scouring every corner of New Haven and its suburbs to find him, Charles Prentice Goodhue, a Yale junior, who had been missing for three days, was found lounging in the lobby of the Hotel Garde, about 7 o'clock this evening. All day the search for the student had been pushed, his father, Charles A. Goodhue, a retired banker, and his brother, Fisher, of 157 East Thirty-fourth st., New York City, personally conducting it.

The searching parties gave special attention to East and West Rocks, which have been often sought by Yale undergraduates of wandering or suicidial inclinations. Secretary Anson Phelps Stokes of the university called a mass meeting at 5 o'clock and enlisted several hundred additional volunteers, who had hardly been organized when Goodhue was found.

The boy was noticed by the telephone girl, Josephine Granfield, and the desk clerk, Matthew Rogers, who compared his descriptionw ith that in the evening newspaper stories. Rogers, spoke to Goodhue, who was incapable of making a coherent answer. They notified the Police Department, and Detective Sergeant James Ward took the young man in charge, notifying his father at the Graduates' Club.

Young Goodhue was taken to the college infirmary. He did not recognize his relatives for several minutes, but regained his faculties when given nourishment. He slept a while and awoke about 10 o'clock greatly improved. He had disappeared from his room about midnight Sunday night, and tonight he told his roommate, James Symington, of New York City, that the last he remembered was going into a lunch room the night he disappeared.

Dr. Harry Arnold regards the case as one of genuine amnesia and thinks that the young man will soon completely recover. Hard work in preparation for a scholarship examination caused him insomnia the last three weeks. He is believed to have spent most of the time since Sunday walking. He had been several hours in the Garde lobby.

Bird Protection

All esthetic considerations apart, there is no question of the value of the birds as destroyers of noxious insects and weeds, and it would be a sad blow to the farmers of the country if laws for their protection could not be enforced. Various States have passed useful legislation to this end. But so many bids are migratory that only Federal law will avail to save them from injury and perhaps ultimate extinction. It is disheartening, therefore, to find a federal Judge in Kansas declaring that such a law is unconstitutional. Many a salutary effort to prevent abuses has been held up by tehnicalities contrary to the spirit of the Constitution, if not the letter. That the Supreme Court of the United States will endorse a constructure so repugnant to humanity and common sense will hardly be believed.

State laws are important so far as they go, and the enforcement of them is more important still. But if the birds who next here are to be shot at will during their southward migation, those who return another year will be fewer in number. Several States have provided "sanctuaries for birds," and the Federal Government has recently followed their example. But even more important as pointed out by the Philadelphia Public Ledger, is the creation of a public sentiment so hostile to the killing of birds that the offenders can be quickly detected and punished. It is conceivable that such a public sentiment may in time be more effective than any law. That is no reason, however, for neglecting the most obvious means of conserving bird life.—Dispatch, Utica.

A. E. Crockett, Assistant Secretary Rochester Chamber of Commerce, Will Speak in City Tuesday Evening.

Flour City Man's Organization Put the "R" in Rochester

Next Tuesday at 8 o'clock p.m. a meeting of the entire membership of the Fulton Chamber of Commerce will be held in the City Hall. This meeting will be addressed by A. E. Crockett, Assistant Secretary of the Rochester Chamber of Commerce. The Rochester Chamber is one of the strongest and most successful in the United States. What Mr. Crokett can tell of Chamber of Commerce work will therefore be particularly well worth hearing.

The activities of the Rochester Chamber are very broad. Among other things, it has taken up during 1915 the arbitration of dispute that would ordinarily be settled by lawsuits; assisted in the framing of the Federal Reserve act; exerted its efforts towards obtaining a satisfactory barge canal harbor for Rochester; helped in the establishment in the city of the right sort of commercial and industrial education; conducted a commercial survey of the city; booked 42 conventions; conducted a three-day cruise with a view to extending the influence of Rochester to the cities on Lake Ontario and the St. Lawrence river; conducted a "cleanup" campaign; conducted "dollar days"; brought about the the removal of unsanitary conditions in the city. These are only a part of this Chamber's activities. They suggest however the possibilities before the Fulton organization.

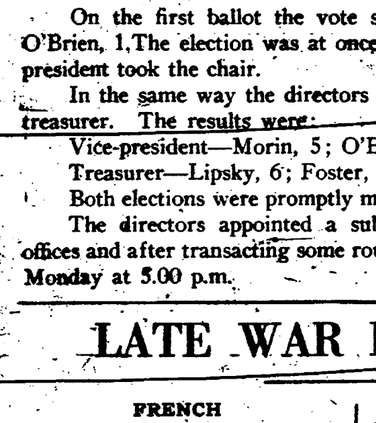
FRENCH

Paris, via London.—The following official statement was issued by the French War Office today:

"There have been artillery duels at different points along the front in in the Woecre district. To the west of the forest of La Pretre we have occupied the village of Fey-en-Haye and have maintained our positions there despite several counter attacks.



"In Lorraine and in the Vosges there is nothing to report.

"To the south of Dixmude Aviation the gap caused by this explosion. Lieutenant Garros brought down an aeroplane by machine gunfire.

Clean Up Campaign

People of Fulton, do we need a "clean-up" campaign this spring? All in favor say "Aye," then write it down along with youd ideas of what such a campaign should accomplish and send it to the The Evening Times. All suggestions will be published in next Saturday's issue. Do it now. Don't think your opinion won't help. Write It Down—for a City Beautiful.

CHAMPION AND CONTENDER ROUNDING INTO SHAPE FOR BIG FIGHT.

"Jack" Johnson and "Jess" Willard are now rounding into shape for their big bout at Havana on April 5. The big black champion, despite reports to the contrary, is going through a strenuous campaign of training with a husky set of sparring partners and expects to enter the ring against Willard in as good condition as when he defeated Jeffries for the world's title. Big "Jess" Willard is also an earnest worker and has won hundreds of admirers by the manner in which he goes through his daily stunts. "Jack" Curley, the fight promoter, is enthusiastic over the prospects of a bumper crowd and a stubbing good fight.

RAIN OF SHELLS FELL FOR TWO HOURS ON BELGIAN PORTS

On the Belgian Frontier.—Allied ships carried out a very heavy bombarded of Zeebrugge on Wednesday night, lasting two hours. There was a constant rain of shells which, bursting above the harbor defences, was plainly visible from the frontier. The German batteries replied, but their fire seemed spasmodic and uncertain.

A number of explosions were heard in the vicinity of the Solvay works, which had been previously bombarded and had been again used as a submarine base for stores.

Much damage was done to the German submarine bases at Zeebrugge and Hoboken yesterday by British aviators, according to a statement issued last night by the Admiralty. The statement reads:

"'I have to report that this morning Flight Sub-Lieutenant Frank G. Andreae carried out a successful air attack on the German submarines which are being constructed at Hoboken, near Antwerp, dropping four bombs.

"'Also, Flight Lieutenant John P. Wilson while reconnoitering over Zeebrugge observed two submarines lying alongside the mole and attacked them, dropping four bombs with, it is believed, successful results.

"'These officers started in the moonlight this morning. Both pilots returned safely.'"

The German submarine warfare in the last twenty-four hours has cost the lives of thirty more non-combatants. Nineteen of the crew of the French steamship Emma and eleven of the crew of the British steamship Seven Seas were lost when the vessels were torpedoed and sunk off Beachey Head, in the English Channel. Both vessels foundered within three minutes after the torpedoes had found their marks.

The Seven Seas, of 632 tons, bound from London for Liverpool, was attacked without warning late yesterday afternoon. Such was the force of the explosion of the submarine's engine of death that the hatches were blown off and an immense hole was torn in the vessel's side. All the officers except the secon engineer were drowned. Of the seven men who escaped and reached Newhaven last night aboard a destroyer three were wounded.

The Emma, bound for Bordeaux, was attacked late on Wednesday. Onlytwo of her crew were saved.

The periscope of the submarine had hardly been sighted from the Emma when the torpedo struck her near the engine room. No warning of any kind was given to the crew, the survivors say. The ship sank in three minutes from the time she was struck.

A British destroyer subsequently picked up the two men, who had been in the water for a couple of hours, and at the same time recovered two bodies.

A dispatch last night from Newha[illegible]id a large Dutch cargo vessel, the Lodewijk van Nassau, had been [illegible]corted into Newhaven by two British torpedo boats under the suspicion that she had been supplying German submarines with fuel oil.

The torpedo boats gave chase to the Lodewijk van Nassau and captured her near Brighton. It is said her crew are [illegible]be Germans. The name of the vessel was painted on each side in huge letters. She had a cargo of oils [illegible]d and was examined. When hailed by the torpedo boats the steamship refused to stop, but she eventually was brought to a halt.

A later dispatch said the Lodewijk van Nassau was released after an examination of her cargo, which revealed the fact that there was no reason for detaining the vessel.

AUSTRIA SEEKS TO MAKE PEACE WITH RUSSIA

Air Attacks Begun Wednesday Continue Upon Zeebrugge, Where Germans Are Bottled Up

London, April 2.—The Times Petrograd correspondent telegraphs:

"The Russko Slovo prints a note of intimation that the Russian government has been approached through neutral channels with overtures from Austria for a separate peace. It is added that this step is undertaken without the knowledge of Germany and that apparently Austria is animated by sincere intentions. These overtures are believed to have been confined to Russia."

Germans Will Force Allies to Attack Over Ground Inundated

London, April 2.—G. F. Steward telegraphs to the Daily News from Rotterdam:

"There is every indication of an early retirement of the Germans from the Yser and of their plan to cover the retreat and prevent an immediate advance of the Allies. Recent German artillery fire on the Yser front has been directed against certain sluices, the destruction of which render it impossible for the Allies to regulate the inundations and would greatly enlarge the area now under water. The German withdrawal of troops is believed to be intended to enable them to settle into the position prepared last autumn and compel the Allies to give battle over sodden lands."

Vienna, via London.—The Austrian War Office gave out the following statement today regarding the progress of the campaign:

"In the East Beskids the enemy during the night attempted several attacks in the Laborcza valley, which were repulsed. Between Lupkow Ridge and Uzsok Pass the fiting continues.

"Near Inoklodz, on the Pilica river, strong Russian forces this morning attacked our troops. After they had reached the entanglements the Russians were driven back with considerable losses.

"In the southern war theatre there has been no change.

ALBANY LETTER DAY BY DAY

By FREDERIC T. CARDOZE

Albany, April 2.—Automobile owners from all parts of the State appear to be deeply intereested in the passage of the bill introduced by Senator Charles W. Wicks of Oneida county, which requires that there shall be lights on all vehicles. The bill goes a step further than the law by providing that it shall be a misdemeanor for failure to illuminate a vehicle.

In talking of the great need of a new law such as the Wicks bill if Secretary George C. Donahue of the New York State Motor Federation says that this bill was urged for introduction by the Federation and that the organization, numbering twelve thousand members, desires that something be done to eliminate all possible accidents upon the highways of the State.

"This bill would compel owners of vehicles to carry lights at night on all the highways of New York State. The automobile is equipped with lights at both ends but the horse drawn vehicle is not," Secretary Donahue declares, "Our association feels that owners of horse drawn vehicles should be compelled to place lights on their wagons, carriages or carts, as the case may be and that no exception should be made in their cases. A horse drawn vehicle proceeding along a country highway at night without a light, is just as liable to run over a person walking upon the highway as not. On the other hand, the driver of a horse drawn vehicle can plainly see the approach of an automobile, in that the lights of the auto can be plainly seen from a considerable distance."

Secretary Donahue in arguing further, says that the automobile driver is allowed by law to go thirty miles an hour on country highways and that there are many accidents due to the fact that a driver of an auto cannot see more than a few yards ahead on a dark night.

"If the horse drawn vehicle has a light," he continues, "it would serve as a warning some two or threee hundred yards ahead and thus give considerable time to the auto driver to slow up and take to the side of the road."

It is contended by Secretary Donahue that much criticism is directed at the automobilist whicch is unjust. He says that they are generally cocnsidered to be at fault for the condition of roads, accidents and too fast driving when as a matter of fact, he is not always to blame.

"The object of the New York State Motor Federation is promoting the passage of the Wicks bill ig to lesson the number of accidents upon our highways and also to preserve human life. Let all vehicles be equipped with lights, even though such lights cost the owners an added sum," Secretary Donahue explains.

It is pointed out that the great necessity for the lights on horse drawn vehicles in the country; the Wicks bill, however, covers cities, towns and villages. It is also pointed out that the activity on the part of the New York State Motor Federation in advocating the Wicks bill is now based upon interest in any form of patented light. The only object behind the movement is to preserve life and prevent accidents.

The Wicks bill has passed the Senate and it is hoped by automobilists will be passed by the Assembly mithin a few days.

FOR EQUALIZATION

Oneida County Men Meet to Draft Bill for a New Law

A committee representing all parts of Oneida county in the matter of preparing a new equalization law met yesterday afternoon in the office of Corporation Counsel Merrill, and after several hours' discussion agreed to prepafe a bill that will embrace the following provisions and introduce it into the Legislature:

The county judge is to appoint a board of equalization to consist of seven members. Of these, three are to be from Utica, one from the southern towns in the second district, one from Rome, one from the third district outside of Rome and one from outside the county but in the judicial district. To be qualified to hold office they must be assessed in the last assessment roll of the town in which they reside either individually or jointly at least $1,500. The term of office is to be three years, except that the first appointees shall hold office, two for one year, two for two years and threee for three years. The board or a committee from the board shall go into each town every year or least every other year to inquire into values and assessments. For the first two years, the members of the board shall serve not to exceed 30 days in each year. They shall receive for their services not to exceed $15 per day and expenses, the amount of compensation per day to be determined by the Board of Supervisors. The board of equalizers has power to appoint a stenographer or clerk or both and to fix their pay. The pay of the salary and expenses of the board and of the clerk and stenographer shall be a county charge. The signatures of a majority of the board, that is, four members shall be required to make an equalization of assessments in the county.

The chairman of the Board of Supervisors is to call the first meeting of the board of equalizers when appointed. Vacancies in office shall be filled by appointment by the county judge.

This bill will be put into shape and introduced, and as all parts of the county are agreed on it, it is believed it will pass. It looks now as though the bill changing the State tax commission would soon become a law, and if this is the case it would mean that the present appeal of Utica from the equalization of the last board would have to be renewed. But the committee agreed that if the bill which it proposes, becomes a law, the Utica appeal will be dropped.

Roosevelt Likely to Return to Fold in Next Political Campaign

Washington, April 2.—While the foremost leaders in the Republican party have discussed the prospects for party success in 1916, they have not taken up the selection of a presidential candidate in a formal way, and their views as to what is best to do to win a victory have not crystallized into any definite plan. It has been made clear that they intend to go slowly in formulating a political program, and that the disposition is to choose the presidential candidate with regard to his ability to win, without particular regard to the ambitions of any one man.

In the discussion Colonel Roosevelt has been considered as an important factor, but the disposition has been to discourage suggestions that he should be given a too prominent place in the party councils unless he takes the initiative in seeking to return to the Republican fold. At the same time, it is the understanding here that there has been a conference between Colonel Roosevelt and at least one of the most prominent Republican leaders, who is not in sympathy with the ideas of the Colonel and who would not be inclined to go to him unless there were an excellent prospect of party harmony, with Colonel Roosevelt as one of the harmonizers. It seems to be taken or granted that Colonel Roosevelt will be found in the Republican ranks next year, and nothing has developed to indicate that he is seeking the presidential nomination.

One bit of gossip in Washington is that Colonel Roosevelt has said that he would be inclined to support as a candidate for President any Progressive candidate except Mr. Taft. Republicans believe that he would support Senator Borah, of Idaho, or ex-Senator Burton, of Ohio, and it is reported that he would stand behind the presidential candidacy of Senator Weeks of Massachusetts. Whether he would be satisfied with the nomination of ex-Senator Root, of New York, is not known. While he was President Colonel Roosevelt expressed profound admiration for Mr. Root, and it is recalled that, for a prior to the Republican National Convention of 1908, he was uncertain as to whether he should throw his support to Taft or Root for the nomination.

Prison Chief Says More Lawyers Ought to Be in Jail, Too

Warden Thomas Mott Osborne took a firm stand for the bill providing indeterminate sentences when he spoke recently under the auspices of the Peekskill Y. M. C. A. in the Colonial Theatre. A prison should be like a hospital, he said, and a man should stay there until cured and no longer.

"When the law attempts to decide how long a man should stay in prison," he added, "the law is an ass. When we have a hundred judges differing with one another, or differing with themselves when they have indigestion, it doesn't make us respect the law as we ought to.

"The bill gives judges the veto power. Perhaps we ought not to give it to them, but we have decided to give them a show. Perhaps we can reform judges as well as prisoners."

The warden said that one of the greatest quarrels he had was that there were not enough people in prison. Too many get away, he said, under the tutelage of lawyers, which made him desirous of finding an easy way for them to slide in, and the lawyers with them.

"We on the outside are the ones who need reform," he went on. "We established the infernal old prison. We should first reform ourselves before we talk of reforming others. At Sing Sing we are only guiding their sanity. We can't do much to improve their bodies because the Legislature keeps them in those diseased cells.

"You hear folks say they have too many picture shows. I am not desirous of giving them too many picture shows, but I'd rather have them have too many than to have them have tuberculosis. These shows are a means of keeping them out of those diseased cells."

Warden Osborne said a pig would have sense enough to die if he were kept in one of "those holes." He added that it was foolish to think that slavery had been abolished with the Emancipation Proclamation, because it exists in every prison in the country. The sensible method, he insisted, would be to pay the men wages and charge them for the keep. No work would thus bring us food.

In defense of his own methods the warden said that the cases of insanity in the prison had dropped in a year from 124 to 64. He eulogized John Murphy, "Canada Blackie," a prisoner who had died recently from tuberculosis, predicting that his memory and influence would live.

DEATH RATE STATISTICS.

Washington.—A death rate in 1913 of 14.1 per 1,000 of the estimated population in the registration area of the United States compared with 13.9 per 1,000 in 1912 is shown in a report by the census bureau. The number of deaths in the registration area, containing about two-thirds of the population, was approximately 890,948.

Washington state showed the lowest rate, being 8.5 per 1,000, while New Hampshire's was the highest, with 17.1. The lowest rate shown in 1913 by any of the fifty registration cities, with populations of 100,000 or over in 1910, was that for Seattle, which was 8.4, while Memphis showed the highest, with 20.8.

The average age at death for both sexes from all causes combined was 39.8; for males alone, 39.2; for females, 40.6. Nearly 18 per cent of all deaths were of infants under one year of age, and more than 25 per cent were of children under five years.

The death rate from tuberculosis declined from 149.5 per 100,000 population in 1912 to 147.6 in 1913. The rate from cancer rose from 68 per 100,000 in 1900 to 78.9 in 1913. The number of suicides was 9,903, the rate being 11.0 per 100,000 compared with 10 in 1912.

NAVAL GUN VIBRATION.

Conditions on a Warship When Heavy Firing Is in Progress.

The average civilian has a very vague idea as to the conditions inside a turret on a war vessel while heavy firing is going on.

The greatest force of the vibration from the firing of a gun is naturally just outside the mussle, and that is outside the turret. So terrific is this vibration that if severe precautions were not taken the deck under the mussle would be ripped to pieces, sheet iron doors would be wrenched from their hangings and skylights shattered. To guard against these effects the deck under the gun mussle is re-enforced with steel plates about an inch thick and skylights are taken off and replaced with coverings of armor plate.

Of course a very considerable roar and jar are felt inside the turret. Men who are looking for the refinement of precaution recommend that gunners wear shoes with rubber cushioned soles and heels to lessen the jar on the deck.

The air vibration, due either to firing in one's own or some other turret, has caused many cases of gun deafness. To stuff the ears with cotton wool is, of course, the commonest expedient followed by men and officers alike. There is also what is called the Cheatham device, consisting of a mixture of clay and wool. It is very flexible, can be molded to any ear and still allows its wearer to hear orders.

Gun deafness may come immediately as a result of a ruptured ear drum or gradually owing to an injury to the auditory nerve.—London Answers.

ANCIENT ROMAN THEATERS.

Augustus Made the Women Sit Apart in the Highest Places.

When Rome was in her glory and the theater most popular distinctions between spectators long remained unknown. When distinctions were made the best seats were not assigned to the priests, for the drama had no such religious significance for the Romans as it had had for the Greeks, but were set apart for the more aristocratic portion of the community.

The orchestra was by law set apart for the senators. Later, perhaps after 67 B. C., the first fourteen rows back of the orchestra were, by the law of Roscius Otho, reserved at Rome for the knights, says Art and Archaeology. Similar arrangements obtained in Roman theaters outside of Rome, though in a provincial town like Pompeii as many as fourteen rows of seats can hardly have been necessary for the knights.

Augustus regulated the whole matter afresh. He confirmed the special privileges already granted to senators and to knights. He relegated the lowest classes to the highest seats and made the women sit apart, likewise in the uppermost places. It is possible that he was the sponsor also for the more exact regulations laid down concerning places of honor for magistrates, priests, etc.

The seats of highest honor were those on the tribunalia. Here the editor and the emperor sat on the right side. On the other tribunal the vestal virgins had their places, and with them the empress.

The Immensity of Space.

A photographic plate exposed to the heavens in a large telescope for any considerable length of time shows nothing but a continuous blur of light, indicating that the photographic eye sees beyond the reach of human vision such a multitude of suns that every part of space is filled. One may gain some inkling of the immensity of space by supposing the photographic plate exposed upon the remotest star it now records and looking out still farther to find the heavens still crowded with millions and millions of suns, each possibly having its own planets.

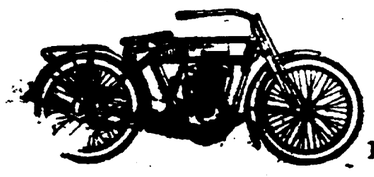
WHY HARLEY-DAVIDSON FACTORIES ARE WORKING NIGHT AND DAY



Since the 1915 Harley-Davidson announcement in October the Harley-Davidson factories have been running day and night to take care of the demand for the 1915 three-speed twin. The 1915 Harley-Davidson is the first Motorcycle to carry a definite guarantee of horsepower. Rated at 11-horsepower, every 1915 Harley-Davidson twin which has left the factory, has developed well in excess of that rating.

By winning the National F. A. M. championship, the 1915 Harley-Davidson proved the claim in the announcement that it was the fastest stock Motorcycle ever built.

By winning the Cleveland Road Race at an average speed of 77 miles per hour, and by covering 74 miles within one hour and 250 miles in 227½ minutes at Sioux City, the Harley-Davidson proved that it not only had the speed, but the reliability and endurance necessary to make it stand up under most strenuous road service.

POLE CHARGED WITH ASSAULT

Man, Who Attacked Ray Quigg at Night, Made No Defense

Casmirik Zajac, every bit as bad a man as his name would suggest, was haled into City Court this morning on a charge of assault referred by Ray Quigg of the West Side. Quigg asserted that on the night of March 31, he was on his way to his home in West 1st st. about midnight. When he reached the southern part of the street he was met by the defendant and another Polak. Quigg did not like the looks of the foreigners and he turned out to let them pass. Thereupon Cajac, with an oath, asked Quigg what was the matter. Quigg made no reply and Cajac without further preamble hit him a vigorous blow on the ear, felling Quigg and rendering him insensible for some seconds. When Quigg revived he arose and gave chase to his assailants but Cajac leaped over a barbwire enclosure and Quigg decided not to risk following him as he thought the man was armed. He followed the other foreigner, however, and caught him after a chase of several blocks, and then marched him down to West Broadway where a policeman stood and, after some persuasion, the man divulged the identity of Quigg's assailant.

A warrant was sworn out yesterday and an officer was detailed to arrest Cajac. He was apprehended last night, and he spent the night in the toils.

This morning, Before Judge Wilson, Cajac entered a plea of guilty and was fined $10 or twenty days. He was unable to pay the fine and was remanded to jail. His friends will probably pay his fine some time today.

Last Night's Story of the Bandstand Gift Worked Havoc.

Shortly after The Evening Times appeared on the streets last night inquiries began to come in over the telephone regarding the story of the bandstand in city park. The fire department was the first to inquire.

While there may have been some doubt in the minds of a few as to the meaning of the last paragraph, almost everyone got the point and realized that the story was just what it was intended to be—an April 1 stunt story. Therefore, it was with considerable surprise that many noticed the story reappear as an established fact in one of the morning papers today, and the fact that the correspondent handled the story seriously was cause for much amusement to others who read the entire Times story. Another correspondent hastened to inform us that "it was a good story but that we had made one mistake, the maple trees in the park were soft maples and one cannot get sugar out of soft maples.

RIGLEY PROPERTY SOLD

Purchaser Does Not Confirm Story That It Will Become a Factory Building.

It was announced late yesterday that J. H. The property was owned by Mrs. J. W. Rigley, and it is said that the consideration was $7,500.

Mr. Sylvester has a lease on the property which will not expire until July 1, and Mr. Connors announced today that he had made no plans in regard to the property beyond that date. He would not confirm a rumor to the effect that the property was to be used for manufacturing purposes.

Mrs. Anna Burlingham entered a plea of guilty to assault, before Judge Wilson in City Hall yesterday afternoon. Mrs. Belle Davis was the complainant. It was charged that Mrs. Burlingham assaulted Mrs. Davis Wednesday afternoon at the corner of 6th and Division sts. Mrs. Davis, when questioned regarding her part in the affair, stated that she was walking along when she was accosted by Mrs. Burlingham who asked her what she meant by going around with Mrs. Burlingham's son, who is only 17 years old. Mrs. Davis made no reply and Mrs. Burlingham called her vile names and then assaulted her, inflicting severe bruises.

Mrs. Burlingham, in condoning her act, said that she did not think it was right for Mrs. Davis, a married woman, to allow her son to call on her, as she thought the boy was not old enough for affairs of the heart. Mrs. Burlingham also stated that Mrs. Davis had reviled her, and for that reason she had begun the assault.

Judge Wilson listened patiently to the recitals of both parties and then delivered a stern lecture. He advised Mrs. Davis to have nothing further to do with young Burlingham, and he warned Mrs. Burlingham that a similar offense in the future would be punished severely. He then fined Mrs. Burlingham $10 or ten days in the Oswego county jail and suspended sentence during good behavior.

ATTORNEY'S NEW QUARTERS

Attorney James R. Somers, who recently leased new quarters in the De Barhour block, is making extensive alterations in his office. A new partition is being installed which will divide the large office into a reception room and private office and the interior will be painted and thoroughly renovated.

Corporal Punishment.

Corporal punishment formerly had a wider significance than mere whipping. Henry de Bracton, chief justiciary of England in the reign of Henry III., divided corporal punishment into two kinds, those inflicted with and without torture. The stocks and the pillory would rank as corporal punishment; also mutilations and other grim tortures when imposed not to extort confessions, but as penalties, and the branding in the hand for felony, which was not abolished until George III.'s time.

Got There Strong.

"My dear, these are very strong cigars you bought for me."

"Well, the man asked if I wanted 'em strong. Naturally I thought you should prefer something strong and durable. But that's just like a man. Next time I'll get 'em weak and see if that will suit you."—Louisville Courier-Journal.

Establishment of a military school at Silver Lake, with a possibility of a naval addition later, is certainly a stroke of good fortune for that pleasant and popular resort.

At South Norwalk, Conn., recently a workman burned his feet while dismantling a baker's oven in which there had been no fire in more than four years. Eighteen inches of masonry were removed before the heat was encountered. The oven was an enormous one, and it took several weeks in the original heating 35 years ago before it was ready for cooking purposes.

"You can't enlist with that on you," said the officer.

"Why not?" said John.

"She hasn't any clothes on, and it might corrupt the morals of the service," said the officer.

"All right," said John, and he left.

The next day he returned. There was "September Morn" fully clothed in a tatooed evening gown and a stunning hat. John enlisted.

LOCAL B. P. O. E. HONOR RULER

Installation of Officers Held Last Night. Five Candidates Initiated

Last night at the Elks' home over one hundred and fifty members met for the installation of their recently elected officers and the initiation of five candidates. At the close of installation ceremonies Claude E. Gufle, in happy vein told of the remarkable growth of the lodge during the administration of Exalted Ruler Stevenson. He said that every member felt that the progress and popularity of the local order was due almost entirely to the untiring energy of Mr. Stevenson, and the whole membership appreciating this fact desired to present to the exalted ruler with their best wishes a life membership in the B. P. O. E.

Mr. Stevenson was taken by surprise but responded in a fitting manner, expressing his appreciation and promising more of the "untiring energy" in the cause of the Elks.

The following officers were installed:

DINNER PARTY LAST NIGHT

Alvin Bache Gave Jolly Party to 25 Guests, at Hotel Royal

A private dinner party was held at the Hotel Royal last night. A party was held at which twenty-five guests were present and Alvin Bache, formerly of Detroit, Mich., was the host. The event was in celebration of his forty-seventh birthday.

During the afternoon there arrived by express from Detroit a birthday cake three feet in diameter, a token of Mr. Bache's popularity among his friends in Detroit. At 7.30 the guests assembled in the spacious diningroom of the hotel which was prettily decorated for the occasion with cut flowers, palms, ets., which gave the whole banquet table an attractive and tempting appearance. An elaborate fish dinner was served.

Lewis Goman, who acted as toastmaster expressed many sentiments appropriate to the occasion and called upon all present for response. After all had expressed their good wishes, Mr. Bache was called to respond to the toast, "A man is as old as he feels. Mr. Bache beaming his appreciation at the profuse expressions of good will, started off his remarks with the statement that "when I struck Fulton I began to feel that I was in a really live town even though the city is a small one."

Following the dinner a musical program was carried out.

P. S. COMMISSION

Should Be Made Free of Entanglements.

The experience of the last few months has brought home to all people many truths that they have only half known before. One of these is that the Public Service Commissions of this State form an institution of such immense power that it should be removed in so far as is possible from disturbing influences.

No branch of the judicial system of this State exerts an influence so tremendous over the commercial affairs of the people of New York as do these commissions. They are constantly called upon to pass upon questions involving millions of dollars. The ramifications of the resulting decisions are almost unending. The man who has money to invest is influenced favorably or adversely; the transportations companies whose prosperity is often the whole prosperity of a community are directly affected by decisions to which the public pays little attention as they are rendered. The men employed by the corporations suffer or prosper, just as the roads prosper or are held back, and finally shippers and consumers are affected in many ways that are obvious.

Since the up-State Public Service Commission has been in existence, many commissioners have come and gone, at the behest of three Governors. From the very nature of the extensive properities over which the commission has jurisdiction—railroads, trolley lines, steamboat lines, express lines, lighting companies, power companies, gas companies and telephone companies, no man can go into office with the technical knowledge to adequately grasp a problem so immense.

When Governor Hughes organized the commission, he selected in so far as was possible, men whose life work had been along lines which would enable them to tackle the complicated problems that were to come to them.

He selected Frank W. Stevens, a lawyer who had handled important railroad cases to bring to the commission the legal knowledge which was required; Martin S. Decker, who had been for years chief examiner for the Federal Interstate Commerce Commission and before whom many important interstate cases had been tried, who brought to the commission an expert knowledge of traffic and rates; Charles E. Keep, who was a banker and consequently brought the requisite financial knowledge; James E. Sague, who had a broad knowledge of mechanics, and their valuation by reason of his experience as a vice president of the American Locomotive Company, and Thomas M. Osborne, who was chosen as a representative of the general public.

With the exception of Mr. Decker, none of these men is now in office; nor are any of their immediate successors in office. Men have come and gone as political tides have ebbed and flowed, and in an office so important as this, it follows that the business interests of the State have necessarily felt the effects of these changes; but it is only in a time like the present when business is disturbed that the lesson comes home to us all. Everyone agrees that what this country needs most is confidence. When confidence is disturbed, money hesitates, the wheels slow down and some men must necessarily be idle.

Every little act that in times of great prosperity might be overcome by the general momentum of business now casts a long shadow and none is likely to be longer than that which is the result of the disturbance in the Public Service Commissions. The recent investigations not only make capital timid of investment in public utilities, but when no one knows what new, untried and inexperienced commissioners may or may not do the directors of public service corporations feel in duty bound to go cautiously for fear that overzealous men may raise up new difficulties.

This condition should not prevail. Commissions of such far reaching importance should be removed from the vicissitudes of politics, and it is to be hoped that the conditions which are now disturbing this division of our commercial life will soon pass away. No solution of the State's problem of public service can be better than the solution which will carry with it the greatest measure of assurence to the public.

In view of all the disturbing conditions in business, it will hardly add to the public confidence to affront the public with a staff of public service commissioners whom ust bearn their duties and while learning still further disturb business. Wherever it is possible to do so, it is believed that Governor Whitman, knowing the timidity of business, will retain expert knowledge. The service of such a man as Martin S. Decker, of the up-State Public Service Commission are needed now more than when Governor Hughes asked him to leave the Inter-State Commercce Commission to come to New York. His wide knowledge of transportation and of valuations and his intimate knowledge of the workings of the commission since its creation should make him a good pilot if Governor Whitman makes radical changes in this office.—Observer, Utica.

Sydney Ayres as Dayton Blair, the foreman of the oil fields owned by his sweetheart's father, makes an impressive figure in his latest picture, "A Matter of Parentage." In this drama he has as an appealing little leading lady a tiny girl of about four years. The plot of the story reveals the adoption of the baby by Dayton Blair. Blossom, as he calls her, makes him very happy.

Lee Willard is quite an artist with the brush as well as in his profession. Until the filming of "Broncho Billy and the Revenuer" his accomplishments at drawing were unknown. But in this play Willard can be seen painting Mr. G. M. Anderson as "Broncho Billy" from life.

SCENE FROM "THE BIRTH OF A NATION."

The photo entertainment, "The Birth of a Nation," combines a pictorial survey of civil war history and of Kuklux Klan days with a love story based on Thomas Dixon's "The Clansman." The battle scenes, engaging thousands of combatants drilled with the well known Griffith elan and realism, are particularly effective. After seeing it some optimists are rash enough to predict that the historical novels of the future will be told in pictures rather than in sentences. It cost to produce nearly $500,000.

It seemed that when the film director who produced "The White Goddess," the three act moving picture production, prepared to take the temple scenes, he secured as many natives of India as was possible. In his effort to secure the utmost realism, this director modeled his temple sets after the famous Temple of the Tooth, located in Kandy, Ceylon.

Cyrus Townsend Brady, the famous author, has written a one reel comedy, "Why Billings Was Late," which contains a superabundance of human interest. Billings' wife has the exasperating habit of taking her own time, but she always seems to get there just the same. Billings prides himself in getting there ahead of time. He fails, however, on this occasion, and his wife laughs best because she laughs last.

Every revolver carried by motion picture westerners has a pearl handle.

Eleanor Kahn and Jack Paul, two ten-year-old children, play a love scene in the photo play "The Little Straw Wife" with exceptional skill. The two children are sweethearts and enact one of the most beautiful scenes of boy and girl love ever portrayed on the screen. The same two characters in the play fourteen years later are portrayed by Edna Maye and Bryant Washburn.

AN OLD TIME BILL

Albany, April 2.—Governor Whitman has vetoed a bill to revive an old railroad franchise in central New York in which former Chief Judge of the Court of Appeals and former Democratic candidate for President Alton B. Parker is said to be interested. It is an old timer and has been vetoed before by Governor Hughes and Governor Glynn. It was introduced by Senator Newton and Aseemblyman Oldfield. Oldfield's bill got through and he gets the veto message which reads thus:

"The proposed measure amends the railroad law by inserting therein a few sections authorizing the construction of a railroad by a corporation which meets the conditions imposed by such section. There is no question as to the obligation and intent of the bill. It is frankly admitted to be for the benefit of a railroad corporation known as the Corning, Keuka Lake & Ontario Railroad Co.

"If the bill named such corporation and gace it the powers and privileges which are sought to be conferred thereby, such bill would be in direct conflict with Section 18 of Article 3 of the Constitution, which provides 'That the Legislature shall not pass a private or local bill granting to any corporation, association or individual the right to lay down railroad tracks.'

"A bill similar to this and passed for the samep urpose was vetoed by Governor Hughes in 1907 on the ground that it was unconstitutional. Governor Glynn vetoed the same bill upon the same ground. As stated by Governor Hughes, a bill attempting such an evasion of the constitutional requirements should not be sanctioned.' In my opinion the bill is unconstitutional and must be disapproved.

"I fully recognize the local conditions which seem to justly demand the construction of a railroad through the towns which are obligated at the outset to aid in such construction. I would gladly aid them in obtaining the relief to which the people of the locality affected by the proposed construction think they are entitled, but this may not be accomplished in this way without, in my opinion, doing violenc to the strict constitutional requirements."

WHAT "MOVIES" HAVE DONE.

Stimulated Growth of Suburbs and Dead Urban Sections.

Five years of the drama in films have given a most impressive example of the valuable support the development of the "movies" has given to real estate. Every afternoon and evening approximately 100,000,000 feet of moving picture films are unreeled for the entertainment of many millions of people who fill seats in more than 25,000 theaters in the United States alone. In all probability the capital invested in such enterprises would aggregate close to $500,000,000.

For New York and other large cities, where the moving picture industry is deeply rooted, these enterprises have done the service of converting many vacant lots, former dumping grounds, into income payers and in not a few instances helped to restore the life of many moribund theaters, now combined vaudeville and picture playhouses, that make easy for their owners the payment of taxes and interest on the realty they occupy.

One of the features of the moving picture theaters, owing to their inexpensive admissions, is that they will thrive in districts which could not support a legitimate theater. Therefore because of this many properties in the suburbs and in the outskirts of cities have been utilized which but for the picture theaters would doubtless be untenanted.

The Earliest Artillery.

We think the eighteen inch artillery as distinctly modern. Yet the first cannon ever taken into the field were of that caliber. A crude mortar was fired at the battle of Crecy, fought in 1346. The early cannon balls were chiseled from stone, and the projectile, which fits the ancient mortar, is made of solid granite. Two powerful men could scarcely lift it. These ancient projectiles remained in use for a surprisingly long time, for it is recorded that in 1807 a British gun of war engaged against the Turks had her mainmast severed by a 700 pound stone shot from a Turkish battery.—American Boy.

Lights.

Mr. Picklelilly came home from his club one morning about 5 o'clock. He entered his happy home, crept up the stairs softly so as not to awaken his spouse, then felt for the switch to turn on the elpetric light. He could not find it and in the darkness stumbled over a chair.

"What's that?" came a voice from the bed.

"Where in the deuce are the lights in this house?" snarled Picklelilly, trying in his bluff to put a bold face on the matter.

IDLENESS.

Idleness is a constant sin and labor is a duty. Idleness is the devil's throne for temptation and unprofitable, distracted musings.—Richard Baxter.

KNOW THYSELF.

It is of dangerous consequence to represent to man how near he is to the level of beasts without showing him at the same time his greatness. It is likewise dangerous to let him see his greatness without his meanness. It is more dangerous yet to leave him ignorant of either, but very beneficial that he should be made sensible of both.—Pascal.

Too Horrible to Contemplate.

"No, Mr. Upp," Phyllis said, with a sigh, "I cannot marry you. I confess that I have much more than a friendly feeling for you, but suppose we were to marry and you should die and leave me in straitened circumstances and I should take in boarders and they should make a pun of my name as landlady, calling me Phyllis Upp?"—London Stray Stories.

The Economy.

"Some people hold that a wife ought to receive a regular salary for her work in the home."

"Then it would be just as cheap to hire a housekeeper."—Baltimore American.

GOOD ROADS FOR THE FARMER

What the farmer needs most is a road from the farm to the nearest railroad station, according to Dr. B. T. Galloway, dean of the state college of agriculture in a talk during the present week farmers' exercises at Cornell. He stated further that what was needed most was more miles of dirt, sand-clay, or gravel instead of so many highways.

He commended highly the nation-wide movement for good roads, but felt that a great deal of the work had been undertaken without due consideration of all the facts involved. He pointed out that only ten per cent. of all the roads in the United States had been improved. Of the individual states Ohio leads with 27 per cent. of improved roads; New Jersey has 23 per cent.; New York 17 per cent. or 7 per cent. above the average of the country as a whole. Pennsylvania has only 4 per cent. of its roads improved.

WHAT THE FARMER NEEDS

He maintains that the farmer is not specially interested in highways and that too much attention has probably been given roads of this type—that what the farmer wants is a road which is good enough for the ready transportation of his products and his supplies, and not so expensive that he is overburdened to build it or maintain it. He advocates the building of sand-clay roads and roads made of gravel or other readily available material.

THE MOVEMENT FOR FEDERAL AID

The movement for federal aid for good roads has depended on a number of factors, according to the director, one of the chief of which has been the influence of the automobile owner and manufacturer. In addition to this there have been demands made on Congress for highways connecting cities which have been planned to parallel railway and trolley lines. Altogether, so the director states, about fifty bills have been introduced in the past five years, and he has had occasion to follow the legislation closely in connection with his former work as assisstant secretary of the United States department of agriculture.

SOME PORK BARREL BILLS

The bills so far introduced have been of three general classes, many of them being merely "pork barrel" measures designed to catch votes or to provide for patronage. Th the second class might be included those which are based on a sound engineering knowledge but which have been advocated to satisfy pleasure seekers and automobile owwners, salesmen and manufacturers—these have been designated as peacock alleys. The third class are those bills which have been planned to satisfy the demands of the farmer. These, however, he thinks have been generally unsatisfactory because the funds were not properly safe-guarded.

MODEL ROAD LAW PROPOSED

Offering constructive details as to what a proper federal road bill should include, the director made the following points: First, that any legislation for good roads should involve co-operation between the states and the federal government, and that under the co-operation the states should furnish funds equal to those appropriated by the government or double those set aside through federal appropriations; second, a combined federal and state fund should be used for construction only, the states assuming all responsibility for maintenance. His reason for this is that the government can not commit itself to expense for maintenance for an indefinite period, and further, the community which uses the road reasonably should be expected to keep it up. The smallest unit to be dealt with by the federal authorities should be the state, which should develop an organization in the state highway department to handle the work much as the organization has been developed in the state agricultural colleges for the handling of agricultural extension work under the Lever act.

ALLOTMENT OF FUNDS

The proportion in the allotment of funds to the various states seems to have been a stumbling block in all preceding legislation. The director thinks that this can be solved by alloting federal funds to the states on the basis, first, of the ratio of the area of the state to the total area of the United States; second, the ratio of the population of the state to the total populaion; and third, the ratio of mileage of post roads to the total post roads of the United States outside of incorporated cities. In working out this ratio, however, the ratio of area should count as 12 per cent. and the other two as 44 per cent each. This basis is decided on as the most fair and equitable and it would keep the very large western states from having a disproportionate amount of funds if the basis were on area alone. He would restrict the kind of road to one of three classes, dirt, sand-clay, and gravel with each community electing the type of road which it wished to have constructed. All construction details are to be under state highway department with the funds pro rated to those communities which fulfill the requirements laid down by that department.

Further he would require that the federal funds should not be paid until the road is complete and passed on after an inspection by federal experts, and that in all cases preference should be given to roads which lead from farm communities to the nearest railroad point.

"THE TIMES" WANTS TO KNOW WHO HAS LIVED HERE THE LONGEST

The Evening Times would like to know who has lived longest in Fulton and its immediate vicinity—say within a radius of six miles of city hall.

Write The Evening Times a letter, if you are an old resident, and tell us some facts about your early days. The Evening Times will publish the letters from the oldest residents. The Times wishes to secure as many interesting facts as possible. The publication of one incident will remind other old-timers of other incidents. so let the letters come, addressed to Publisher, The Evening Times, Fulton, New York.

We offer—To the person showing the longest continuous residence in the city or its vicinity, absence of less than one year, or service in the army or navy not counted against the pioneer, we will send The Fulton Evening Times free for the remainder of his or her life. To the second oldest pioneer we will send the paper for three years free, and to the third, one year free.

ARMY WILL TRAIN STUDENT RESERVE

College Men Expected to Flock to Summer Camps.

PRAISED BY COLLEGE HEADS

Presidents Lowell, Hadley and Hibben Among Those Who Uphold New Movement—Step Toward Creation of Adequate Military Reserve Conceived by Major General Wood.

Officers attached to the staff of Major General Leonard Wood commanding the eastern division of the army on Governors island, are completing the preliminary arrangements for a great camp for military instruction to be organized at Plattsburg barracks in New York state next summer.

It is said that the camp will be a step toward the creation of an adequate military reserve in this country. Those who will receive the training will be college and university students.

This summer camp for students was General Wood's idea, and he conceived it while he was chief of the general staff. It is expected that the attendance at Plattsburg and the three camps in other parts of the country will probably double that of any previous year.

In announcing the plans for the camps the general staff says:

The benefit of these camps to the nation is that they foster a patriotic spirit, without which a nation soon loses its virility and falls into decay. They spread among the citizens of the country a more thorough knowledge of military history, military policy and military need, all necessary to the complete education of a well equipped citizen in order that he may himself form just and true opinions on military topics.

As a military asset these camps are of great value, since they afford the means of materially increasing the military reserve of the United States by instructing a class of educated men from which in time of national emergency would probably be drawn a large proportion of the volunteer commissioned officers, upon whose judgment and training at such a time the safety and even the lives of many of their fellow countrymen will largely depend.

The ultimate object sought is not military aggrandizement, but to make provision, in some degree, to meet a vital need confronting us as a peaceful and unmilitary people, to the end that peace and prosperity may be preserved through the only safe precaution—viz, more thorough preparation and equipment to resist any effort to break such peace.

The camp will be in command of a regular army officer yet to be named, and all of the instructors will be from the regular establishment. Among those indorsing the project are President Lowell of Harvard, President Hadley of Yale, President Hibben of Princeton, Chancellor Kirkland of Vanderbilt and Dr. John H. Finley, the commissioner of education of New York state.

Dr. Hadley Praises Plan.

President Hadley says: "The present European crisis adds force to every argument which has previously been urged in favor of student camps and the formation of a national defense corps."

Dr. Hadley points to England as a warning to this country. England, he says, has the men to make good soldiers, and she can manufacture the arms and accouterments needed, but the deficiency that she cannot speedily make good is the lack of officers competent to train and lead the new levies.

Dr. Hadley then points out that while the German loss in officers has been as great as that of England in proportion to the number of men engaged, she has nevertheless escaped the predicament of England. In time of peace she prepared herself, not merely the situation that has been created. She did this, he points out, by indorsing every highly educated man in the German empire to qualify for duty as a reserve officer.

Speaking of the students who will attend the camps this summer throughout the country, General Wood said:

"They are setting a splendid example and demonstrating by their action that they appreciate that Americans in addition to the faithful discharge of their civic duties in time of peace have an appreciation of the obligation to prepare themselves to efficiently discharge that highest duty of the citizen service for the country in time of war. When a people forego this obligation the nation dies. We want at these camps the largest possible number of young men who possess the required military qualifications; they can render no better service to the country or to themselves."

FEARED LURE OF CRIME.

Rather than return to a life of crime, Fred Cassman committed suicide at a hotel in Philadelphia. In a letter found in his room Cassman said that up to twenty years ago his career had been one of petty crimes and that he had reformed as the result of twenty lashes given him at the whipping post in New Castle, Del., in 1895. Of this crime, he said, he was innocent.

From that time until a few months ago, the letter went on, he had been in business in the west. After the death of his wife and son he returned to Philadelphia, where he met some of his companions of former days and, fearing their influence, he had decided to end it all.

SUNDAY BATS A HOME RUN

Evangelist Back on Diamond For First Time in Twenty-four Years.

Although he had not been in the professional field for twenty-four years, Billy Sunday stood up at bat before Ben Shibe, owner of the Athletics, on the diamond on the Phillies' grounds, knocked a homer the first crack and circled the bases in sixteen seconds.

"I've still got some of the old time pep left," he said. "If I'm not as good as I used to be, I'm sure I could train up in a short time and make my living on the diamond again if necessary."

At Shibe's invitation Sunday took a whirl out to the field while his assistants conducted the routine prayer meetings in the Tabernacle. Ripping off his coat, Sunday grabbed up a bat in the clubhouse and dashed for the plate, where he dropped into his old time pose and waited for Shibe to toss one over. Ben put the first ball squarely over the plate. Sunday made a vicious swing, caught it squarely and finished the bases puffing like a steam engine.

TWINS BORN FAR APART.

Oddly Enough They Also Have Different Birthdays.

A boy and a girl, twins, were born in Alliance, O., on different days and at different places.

They are healthy, and their mother, Mrs. Rosina Folgia, thirty-two, is doing well. The girl was born shortly before midnight in the Folgia home. The next morning Mrs. Folgia was taken to a hospital, where she gave birth to her son. He weighs ten pounds. His sister weighs six and one-half pounds.

THIEF TOOK COAT AND FEVER

A good mackintosh and a million, more or less, full sized scarlet fever germs was the extent of booty obtained by a sneak thief who entered the home of Dr. Preston Steele of Greenville, Pa., and took the coat from a bag hanging on the back porch.

The garment was used by the physician exclusively in entering the sick rooms of patients suffering from scarlet fever. The police are watching the board of health's reports.

Great Britain's Plan to Starve Germany Is Without Precedent

Unless all signs fail, the United States will make more than a mere protest against the recent British Orders in Council which insulate Germany from the world; which places an embargo on all her imports and exports. The State Department has never deviated from its position that Great Britain's action is without precedent in international law. Even if there were no material interests of the United States involved, this Government would feel itself in duty bound to protest against a violation which threatens the few rights that neutrals possess in time of war.

What will come after the protest? That is the great question now perplexing officials and diplomatic Washington. It is almost certain that England will not retreat from the position she has taken. She has not issued her orders without mature deliberation, and she will not be swerved from her purpose of "starving Germany out" as her avowed policy is popularly termed. For this reason the outcome of the negotiations of the United States, which represents the interests of all the neutral nations of the world in the matter, are awaited with the highest interest. It is almost the universal impression that the United States has already so far committed itself against Great Britain's policy that a backdown now would be an act of stultification.

Of course no responsible official believes any genuine friction or hard feeling between the United States and England will develop as a result of the incident. The United States will probably show itself entirely willing to await for an adjustment of all differences by a properly constituted jury after the war is over. She will make an emphatic but dignified protest, to be followed by other negotiations if Great Britain paves the way for them. It is expected that the British Foreign Office will do everything in its power to reassure the United States that its interests as a neutral will be properly cared for; that the financial loss following the new blockade policy will be reduced to a minimum, since all cargoes and consignments to Germany will be taken and paid for by England so far as such a policy is feasible. In fact an informal reassurance of this type has already been received by Washington, but it does not affect the broad principle for which the United States is fighting.

Great Britain has not declared a blockade of Germany for the reason that she cannot do so. She does not control the Baltic, and exports and imports from Sweden and Norway are beyond the influence of her fleet, and beyond the influence of Russia's. A blockade of an entire nation which does not cover all the ports of that nation is not a blockade within the meaning of international law.

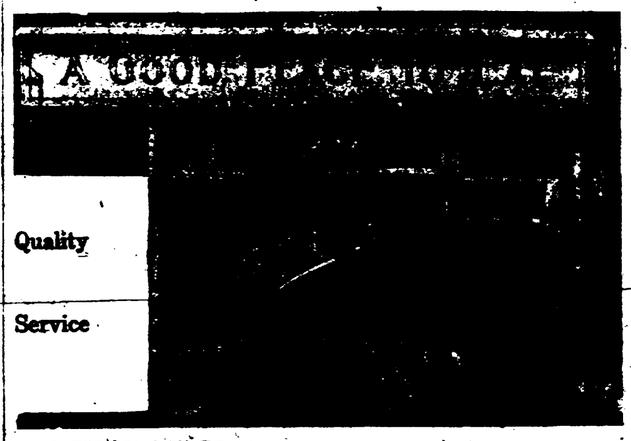
Great Britain might declare a blockade of individual German ports near the North Sea, but this also is equally impracticable, since she cannot send her fleet anywhere near within hailing distance of these ports. What she is attempting to do, therefore, is to gain all the practical results of a blockade without going to the extremely hazardous task of imposing one. This she will do, according to her new Orders in Council, by stopping all ships destined for German ports on the high seas and turning them back.

The most serious element in the situation, from the Washington point of view, is the implied threat in the British note to stop all shipments to Norway and Sweden which the British Foreign Office suspects is destined for Germany. Not merely contraband is involved in the Orders in Council, but all shipments which may go to German. This revolutionary principle enunciated by Great Britain will be resisted by the United States vigorously. There is some basis in law, according to some authorities, including Senator Lodge, Ex-Senator Root and Frederick R. Coudert, for the type of blockade which Great Britain is instituting; but none whatsoever for the stoppage of neutral trade which is now threatened.

It is certain that a new and critical period of Anglo-American relations is now being ushered in. Both nations will probably survive it without any permanent scar, but a safe and steady hand will be required at the helm on both sides of the Atlantic.

ROUND ABOUT

Canada has voted another $100,000,000 for the war. Voting away public money is one of the easiest ways of demonstrating patriotism that there is.



Yale graduates still favor the law as affording the best opportunity for future distinction, but engineering is becoming increasingly attractive to them.

Rain checks are not necessary when the weather interferes with operations in the Dardanelles. The progress of the allied fleet is sufficiently checked without them.

It is the aristocracy of England which has sent the largest proportion of young men to the war front. The "lower class," especially that of Scotland, has furnished the second greatest proportion of recruits. The middle classes appear to have avoided sharing the nation's burden.

Henry Siegel, the former New York merchant, when told recently that Mrs. M. V. Wilde, as his former wife now styles herself, was going to the battlefields in Europe as a driver of a motor ambulance, said: "No friend of mine will try to stop her. She can't get too near the front to please me."

FARMERS BULLETINS

They May Be Had by Addressing Congressman Mott

Congressman Luther W. Mott, of Oswego, is sending out from his office in that city, to all parts of the 32nd District, to farmers and all others who may be interested, the latest list of Farmers' Bulletins, as published by the Department of Agriculture. On that list is a bulletin of interest to every one, and the Congressman, in the future, as in the past, is only too willling to be of service to any one in the district who is desirous of securing any of the Government publications. They are free, and are to be had for the asking, the only limitation being the number to be received by one person. Five bulletins to each address have been determined upon as the proper number, as the demand is tremendous from all over the country, and in many instances, bulletins on like topics and quite similar in contents. Congressman Mott, for the information of those who do not follow public affairs closely, is now in Oswego, and will be for the greater part of the Summer, during the adjournment of Congress. Inquiries for bulletins should, for expediency's sake, be sent to him there.

TRYING TO SAVE STATE 1,000,000

One of the most remarkable documents of recent years in the prison reform field has just been issued by the Prison Association of New York and will have wide circulation in this State. Twenty-nine of the leading specialists in the United States in prison administration have in individual letters united in condemning any plan of the Legislature of the State of New York to rebuild Sing Sing prison on its present site. Such a policy is termed by these experts unmodern, extravagant, behind the times and certain to be the beginning of a serious burden financially upon the taxpayers.

Without exception the specialists advocate the establishment of a farm industrial prison in the country and point out that such a prison will be far more economical to the State besides being reformative, instead of punitive, more healthy, more adapted to the unskilled abiliyt of a great number of prisoners, as well as affording a change to deal with prisoners individually through the honor system and proper classification.

Among those whose letters are reprinted are Dr. Charles R. Henderson, the leading penologist in the United States and the representative of this country on the International Prison Commission. Dr. Henderson states that Sing Sing has long been a disgrace and a scandal. To perpetuate this antiquated type would be a dishonor to New York in the eyes of specialists the world over.

* * *

Joseph P. Byers, the President of the American Prison Association, writes that there is no one in these days who does not advocate ample room outside the prison buildings for exercise, recreation and outdoor employment. He also advocates the abolition of the old prison construction that provides interior cells built in tiers.

* * *

Three ex-presidents of the American Prison Association are emphatic in their condemnation of any plan to rebuild Sing Sing on its present site. One of them, Warden J. T. Gilmour, for twenty years warden of the Central Prison in Toronto, Canada, writes that he is amazed that one possessed of ordinary intelligence should require an argument on behalf of the prison farm. He states that his views in favor of the farm prison are based on 14 years' experience with 10,000 men in the old time cellular prison and subsequent to this upon five years' experience with 6,000 men upon a broad, extensive prison farm.

* * *

Dr. James A. Leonard, Superintendent of the Ohio State Reformatory, and an ex-president of the American Prison Association, writes that he is chairman of a Commission who are to build a new Ohio penitentiary on 2,000 acres twenty-five miles west of Columbus.

* * *

Amos W. Butler, an ex-president of the American Prison Association, and whose reputation is national on prison matters, announces that there should be not less than one acre for each inmate based upon the maximum population.

* * *

Dr. Harris R. Cooley, Director of Public Welfare, Cleveland, Ohio, who established the famous Cooley Farms writes that while Ohio started to rebuild the old prison at Columbus, the people of Ohio came to realize that it meant giving up the outdoor prison plan and public sentiment then demanded that the institution be moved. "The money put into the rebuilding of the old institution will be in a large measure lost and every one now feels that it was a mistake."

* * *

Frank Moore, Superintendent of the New Jersey State Reformatory and a vice-president of the American Prison Association, states his conviction that to perpetuate Sing Sing by the reconstruction of the plant on its present site would be a very great mistake.

Others who are equally emphatic are: Thomas J. Tynan, Warden of the Colorado State Penitentiary; Frank L. Randall, Chairman of the Prison Commission of Massachusetts; John Koren, President of the American Statistical Association; Dr. William Healy, Director of the Juvenile Psychopathic Institute of Chicago; W. H. Whittaker, Superintendent of the Workhouse, District of Columbia; D. C. Peyton, General Superintendent of the Indiana Reformatory, Jeffersonville; Mrs. Jessie D. Hodder, Superintendent State Reformatory for Women, South Framingham, Massachusetts; Dr. S. A. Knopf, Specilist in Tuberculosis in New York City; Dr. Katherine Bement Davis, Commissioner of the Department of Correction, New York City and many others.

The question of the rebuilding of Sing Sing has become a State issue. For many years the State has recognized that Sing Sing must be abandoned and a new prison built. This year, because of the alleged necessity of economy, a plan has been broached to start to rebuild Sing Sing. The Prison Association has convincingly pointed out that $750,000 expended for this purpose would mean the entering wedge for a prison costing several million dollars, of an antiquated type, on a fearfully congested area, whereas the entire trend of prison reform throughout the country is toward the farm industriay prison.

Assembly bill No. 1529, prepared by the Prison Association, provides an alternative plan whereby the State will build upon 821 acres of land in Keekman, Dutchess County, purchased for the so-called Tmrap Colony, a modern, economical farm prison.

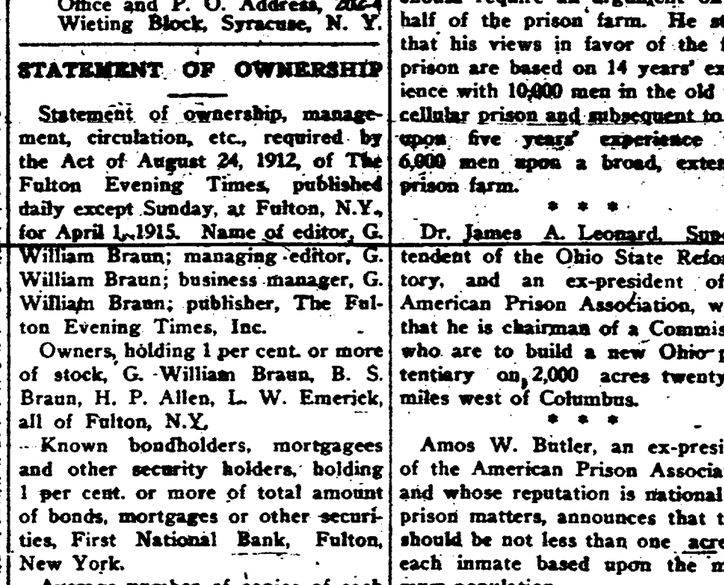
* * *

The bill further provides that the State Industrial Farm Colony for Habitual Tramps and Vagrants shall be established upon the Wingdale site purchased several years ago for a State prison site and found to be unsuitable for the employment of tramps. The bill carries an appropriation of $500,000 for prison construction and maintenance at Beekman and $100,000 for the Tramp Colony on the Wingdale site.

* * *

Two important facts underlie the introduction of this bill. In the first place, it has been estimated that a modern farm industrial prison, with many inexpensive buildings, can be erected and equipped at a per capita cost of $1,000 per inmate, which would make the new prison in the country cost the State a million dollars less than as originally planned some years ago.

* * *



The second underlying fact is that if the State can once become convinced that the compulsory labor of tramps and vagrants for the State can be made profitable, the State will come to see that it should follow the example of continental countries like Belgium, Holland and Germany, where vagrancy colonies have been in existence for generations and would under no circumstances be given up.

* * *

Therefore, the Prison Association and others interested in the welfare of the State along correctional lines, urge a reasonable appropriation for the so-called tramp colony, and they believe that one year's demonstration upon the Wingdale site, which is on the Harlem Division of the New York Central Railroad, several miles north of Pawling, will show conclusively that vagrants may be worked upon the land by the State with a minimum of cost and with a maximum result.

Near the farm of Le Cholera, north of Berry-au-Bac, we blew up a mine saphead at the moment the Germans were at work on it, and we followed up this explosion with a storm of projectiles from our 75-millimetre guns. A German observation post disappeared in the gap coused by this explosion.

GERMAN

Berlin, via London.—The German headquarters staff in its report today on the progress of hostilities makes the statement that in the month of March the German eastern army took 55,800 Russian prisoners, including officers and soldier, and captured also nine cannon and sixty-one machine guns. The text of the report follows:

"In the western arena of the war: During gthe capture of the hamlet of Klosterhoek, which was occupied by Belgians, and a small point of support at Dixmude, we took one officer and forty-four Belgian soldiers prisoners.

"The fighting to the west of Pont-a-Mousson and to the south of the Forest of Le Pretre came to a standstill last night. French troops have penetrated a small portion of our outer trenches. The engagement is being continued today.

"During outpost engagements yesterday to the northeast and east of Luneville, the French suffered considerable losses. In the Vosges only artillery duels took place yesterday.

"In the eastern arena: The situation in the Augustowo and the Suwalki districts remains unchanged. Russian attempts made at night to cross the Rawka river at a point southeast of Skierniewiez resulted in failure, and Russian attacks on Opoomo were repulsed.

JAMES J. HILL SAYS WAR WILL END OCT. 1

New York, April 2.—James J. Hill, head of the Great Northern Railway, yesterday expressed the opinion that the European war would end October 1 next. His opinion attracted much attention in the financial district because it coincided with that of Jacob H. Schiff, head of Kuhn, Loeb & Co., published recently. Mr. Hill said:

"The successes of one side or the other will not settle the ght, but the physical, financial and industrial exhaustion of the belligerents will end the war by next autumn. At least, that is my firm belief."

Mr. Hill believes that foreign credits established here will mount to much higher figures than those already reached.

"We can't kill our best customers," he continued, "and if thef cannot paf us with gold, we shall have to give them credit. That is a matter for our bankers, and they may be expected to prepare adequately for what financing is needed."

YANKES ARE DEFEATED FIIRST TIME THIS YEAR

Savannah, Ga., April 2.—The Chicago Cubs played a cruel Fools' day joke on the Yankees yesterday, inflicting upon them their grst defeat this year—score 7 to 0.

All the scoring was done while Carroll Brown was on the mound, and the Cubs' runs were mostly earned. Brown was in the midst of one of his wild streaks, and in trying to put the ball over the plate was forced to denude it of all deceptive curves, drops and slants.

Brown has hit heavily; "King" Cole, his successor, scarcely at all. Jimmy Lavender yielded only three hits in five innings. Cy Williams, Bresnahan's young center elder, led at bat with four hits in as many times up.

Fritz Maisel reported indisposed and Lute Boone was shoved over to ll in at third. Roger Peckinpaugh returned to shortstop, though still threatened with the loss of a finger nail.

The Cubs waited not upon the order of the scoring, but walked into Carroll Brown at the start. Good bunted safely; Fisher linedd dad single to dcdenter. Schulte's sacrifice bunt lit in left field after Sweeney had mauled it brutally, Good scoring and Fisher reaching third. Schulte advanced a base while Brown was throwing out Zimmerman, and after Saier had fanned Williams drove to center the hit that scored both Fisher and Schulte.

Again, in the third, Williams furnished the motive power back of a Cub scoring movement. Schulte was hit on the arm opening the inning. Zimmerman flied out, but Saier dropped a hit ni left and Williams rammed another to center. Saier tried to score on an ineld out, but was trapped and Williams perished immediately on an attempted double steal.

A "GARDEN CITY" IN A COUNTRY VILLAGE

(Courtesy American City Bureau)

PERSONS driving through Noroton, Conn., over the Boston Post Road, see near the village school an old colonial house surrounded by a number of acres of woodland and meadow. An archway by the roadside with the inscription "Noroton Garden City," marks the entrance to this place, believed to be the first rural affair of its kind. The inspiration for this undertaking came about through a visit I made to Gary, Ind., where such wonderful work is being done for foreign-born children. I came away with the desire and determination to do something for our own New England youngsters that would mean more than mere book learning.

Our little village of Noroton has a fairly good school, but these 150 chilren had little or no instruction in things pertaining to outdoor life. There are in the community a few of foreign birth, largely Italian and Irish. A longing to help all these children to their best came over me, and in discussion with various people as to what we could do for our boys and girls, the name of Dr. R. J. Floody, of Worcester, Mass., was mentioned as the originator and practical demonstrator of a plan which had been most successful in the crowded districts of Worcester for the last seven years, and which has since become The International Children's Garden City League. We forthwith made arrangements for Dr. Floody to come to us and give his illustrated lecture on "The Bad-Boy Myth" in our church, to which everyone was invited.

At first I took all responsibility of this project upon myself, but, realizing it was too large an affair to be carried on by one individual, I called representative people of Noroton together and explained the plan and its object. A keen interest was manifested, and afterwards we formed what is now The Noroton Garden City Association, with a board of directors consisting of men and women. Since that time the Association has been supported by voluntary contributions from interested citizens.

The Children's City

It is a city of gardens, governed by children from eight to sixteen years of age. Each garden measures ten by eighteen feet and is owned for the season by the child, who pays the sum of ten cents. An owner's card, equivalent to a deed, is given to the purchaser to show that there has been a transfer of property. This card entitles the holder to seed sufficient to plant the garden, but it is not given until the soil has been properly prepared and approved.

When all the plots have been taken, the owners select ten from their number who are the "nominating committee." They in turn select a Mayor and seven councilmen. To obtain the results sought, the Mayor must be a good leader and one above reproach in the boy mind. The Mayor and his Council make all the laws, select the Chief of Police, one policeman to every ten landholders, and other officials, such as flag, garden, water, road, tool and animal commissioners. The Chief and other officers wear badges bearing "Noroton G. C. Police," and perform the usual duties of those officials; it is needless to say that every boy is anxious to wear a badge.

The fifty-foot flagpole was the gift of one of our interested citizens. The flag was given by the Junior Order of Mechanics. The formal flag-raising was the occasion of a very festive gathering of neighbors and friends, who came together to see the Stars and Stripes float over the new city and to hear the words and songs of the many well-wishers. The address by Dr. Floody was a particularly interesting feature. A beautiful pedestal surmounted by a sun dial was the gift of another friend. The seeds necessary to plant the gardens were given by one who from the first was interestd, and the crushed stone for the main road and boulevards was donated by others, as were many plants. A sanitary drinking fountain is also an acquisition of Garden City.

A woman supervisor of the garden and a man in the adjoining playground kept the children under their supervision; a beautiful garden and a well-kept playground were the results. The Mayor of Garden City and his officers were in power until the close of the season, at which time the Chief of Police and his staff turned in their badges.

The boys were taken on camping trips, much to their joy, and both boys and girls were instructed in swimming at the nearby beach. As a special reward for best work and conduct in gardens, 31 of the gardeners were taken to Bronx Park, New York City, in October. Several citizens loaned their motor cars for the occasion. The party started in the morning on the long ride over the perfect road to the new park, where they enjoyed the flowers and animals. A picnic lunch was provided for them, and as a finishing treat they saw the aviation race from Fordham Heights.

RUSSIANS READY IN FINLAND TO REPEL INVASION

London, April 3.—Enormous numbers of Russians have been concentrated on the coast of Finland to prevent any attempt by Germany to land troops there. Rumors have reached London from numerous sources that Germany was arranging for the transport of troops from her Baltic seaports for an invasion of Russia from the sea, and a Stockholm dispatch which tells of the Russian move to meet this expected invasion indicates the operation is well under way.

Reports from the eastern front last night said Grand Duke Nicholas' armies were on the offensive from the Baltic to the Caucasus. All the Russian advances, according to Petrograd advices, are proceeding with success.

The Russian official report issued last night says the Germans in Nort Poland are bing pushed back to the East Prussian border, and that in the Carpathians between Lupkow and Uzsok passes the Russians have captured still another strongly fortified ridge, overcoming in doing so almost insurmountable difficulties, such as the scaling of steep, ice-covered hills and penetrating cleverly arranged barbed wire and timber obstructions.

The Russians also have taken the offensive against the German force in the region of Koziouwka, near the Uzsok Pass, which has for so long been launching attacks against the Russian position. In that district a large number of prisoners are reported to have been captured.

Against these statements of Russian successes hte Austrians say they have repulsed all the Russian attacks in the Beskid range of mountains, farther east.

The Russians declare they have successfully countered an Austrian raid into Bessarabia, near Chotin. Their reports say units of the Forty-second Honved ddivision of the Austrian army, which undertook this diversion, were almost annihiliated, and that more than 2,000 of the survivors were captured.

On the western front the battles are of a scattered nature. Beyond artillery engagements the only fighting that has taken place is in the forest of Le Petre, west of Pont-a-Mousson, where the French are trying gto reach the roads leading from St. Mihiel to Metz, and the south of Perquie, where the French also are on the offensive.

During the last twenty-four hours news has been received in London of the sinking of the British steamship Eston, the Norwegian bark Nor and three British trawlers by German submarines, and of the Dutch steamship Schieland, presumably by a mine. Seven sailors of the Schieland are missing.

The Eston formerly was the South Point. Her name was changed when she left Philadelphia on February 11 with a cargo of 7,078 tons of flour for destitute Belgians. The cargo was the gift of millers in twenty-five of the American States. She then flew the flag of the Commission for Relief in Belgium, and reached Rotterdam on March 1.

In connection with the submarine warfare the German protest, made through the United States, against the refusal of Great Britain to recognize the captured crews of submarines engaged in attacks on merchant ships as prisoners of war and the British Foreign Secretary's reply thereto, are causing much interest in London. The British reply declared that, while more than a thousand sailors belonging to war ships destroyed by British men-of-war had been rescued by the victors, not a single British sailor had been picked up by the Germans when they were successful.

SCIENTIFIC CITIZEN FARMING

TO produce a healthy, happy, efficient citizenship is the highest municipal aspiration. How intelligently are we striving towards such a goal? To attain it, our chief need is that each citizen shall be interested, not only in his own welfare and contentment, but in that of every other citizen. Are we really educating a citizenship of that type?

We know that men neither gather grapes of thorns, nor figs of thistles; that what men sow, that they also reap; and that no man liveth unto himself alone. Inexorable truths, these, that we too often leave out of sight in running our cities, for the neglect of which we all pay the inevitable penalty.

Each year we sow a crop of citizens for future gathering. Each year we gather in the crop sown twenty-one years ago—or so much of it as survives. So that this year we gather for use as full-grown citizens, the crop sown in 1894; and next year, the one sown in 1895. At the same time we plant a crop for 1936—and so it goes.

The question is, Are we doing any more scientific citizen farming than they did twenty-one years ago?

As we gather in this year's crop, we notice that some of that 1894 seed hasn't turned out well. Indeed, an overlarge percentage hasn't turned out at all, but died the first year. In the next few years more of the stock died from lack of vitality. Quite a lot of the twelve- to sixteen-year-old stock had to be sent to various reform institutions, where a poor sort of mending was attempted. On the other hand, come of the seed has attained vigorous, sturdy growth, just the kind to pay good returns to the city.

Nowadays, in scientific farming, when we want to learn whether one soil is better than another, or whether one kind of fertilizer succeeds better than another, we take good seed and plant it in different sections of our farm, and with different fertilizers, and try out what conditions and what soil produce the best results. We've been doing this for many years in our cities with our citizen seed—the only difference being that the scientific vegetable farmer proceeds according to the results of his experiment, while our unscientific citizen-growers, as a rule, pay no attention whatever to the results, and continue to waste more seed, farming along the old lines.

We've tried planting citizens 290,000 to the square mile; we've tried growing them in rooms without light and air; tried raising them in cellars; tried growing them with a minimum of food; tried training the young plants on the streets, and in the unsupervised dance halls, cheap theatres and low-grade amusement parks, feeding them, too often, on whiskey and vulgar suggestion, and then—when we raise a sickly, stunted growth, and find, in addition, that we have lost a lot of good seed—we exclaim, "Oh, isn't this dreadful! What shall we do?" And we answer our own question by doing the same thing all over again.

We lean over his fence, and laugh at the immature beets, and sickly stunted corn of the farmer who tries to raise good vegetables this way; but when we see the stunted youth and consider the lives lost because of our own careless, haphazard way of citizen farming, we cannot laugh.

All this has been suggested by two books that came into the editor's office a few days ago and sat down with very determined expressions, as though they meant to stay until they had an interview. These are Louise de Koven Bowen's "Safeguards for City Youth at Work and at Play"; and "A Course in Citizenship," compiled by a number of writers and authorized by the Massachusetts Branch of the American School Peace League.

Mrs. Bowen's position as president, during the last seven years, of the Juvenile Protective Association of Chicago, has given her exceptional opportunities to know what conditions retard the physical growth and corrupt the morals of the youth of a great city, and to what the city government is responsible.

In her introduction, she says:

"The members of the Juvenile Court Committee gradually discovered that the city was full of dangerous spots for children. The disreputable dance halls, pool-rooms, and saloons never closed their doors. They were always open and the children were always tempted. The demand for amusement was insistent, the supply of facilities for innocent recreation was inadequate, and so year after year the same thing took place and a straggling procession of children living under the same conditions, exposed to the same temptations, wended its way in and out of the Court."

Mrs. Bowen gives a chapter to the need for civic protection in recreation, and doubtless she could have written a book on the subject. There is something pitiful in the fact that from the beginning of the Committee's investigation "it was obvious that the majority of children fell into difficulties through their search for recreation." The desire for recreation on the part of children anywhere, in city or country, is normal and healthy, and should have a normal, healthy satisfaction. It would seem that the very least a city government can afford to do in this connection would be to see that the commercialized places of amusement and recreation are so supervised and regulated as to make them reasonably safe places for the young people who frequent them. The pages devoted to the results of an investigation

FUN RAYS

By Roy L. Hopgate

SIZZLING LINGERIE.

WHEN the weather is hot it's as likely as not you'll sizzle most all the day; you will act like a fool just to try to keep cool—you'll hide from the sun's scorching rays. But the women don't care, and the sun, in despair, will give up the fight in dismay; for the heat she will defy and the sun she will cheat in her shimmering lingerie. Now, a man in business will endeavor to dress as cool as he can on his pay; and he'll go where the breeze gently sways the tall trees—where white-crested waves greet at play. But the sun cannot stop "her" from a shop, though he burns a big hole in the clay; she's as happy and gay as a frog in a pool—in her shimmering lingerie. Now, a man will be made and he'll go almost nude, to cool off the summer—but, day! the hot sunshine will scorch his old hide like a torch—and there is the devil to pay. But the women don't mind, and much pleasure they'll find on a ninety degree above day; they're as cool as can be, they are happy and free—in their shimmering lingerie.

Easter

"Now let the heavens be joyful,
Let earth her song begin.
Let the round world keep triumph,
And all that is therein.
Invisible and visible,
Their notes let all things blend,
For Christ the Lord hath risen,
Our joy that hath no end."

The spirit of Easter had its birth in that dim past when man's wondering eyes first vaguely sensed the promise of the swelling seed, the mystery of bursting bud, the miracle of resurrected life in leaf and flower. Down through the countless ages have thundered the hosanas of vernal joy, peans of welcome to the reborn earth pregnant with its gift of immortality. In every land, savage and civilized, in every step of man's uplift from barbarism to culture, from prehistoric to modern times, each passing year has witnessed the passionate rythm of wailing, lamentation and agonized despairing prayer for the dead god, until at a mystic moment, penitential sacrifice and fasting, weeping and mourning give way to transports of joy which hail the resurrected deity who has broken again the grim gates of death.

We Christians have no monopoly of the undying Easter idea of death, resurrection and immortality, of a deity who rises triumphant from the dead. That has been, the radiant principle of humanity's instinctive religion from the early dawn of man's spiritual life. Nature herself gives to humanity her choicest treasures when she clothes the world with grass and flowers at Eastertide. This awakening brings a promise of beauty to last for many months. All mankind hails with joy the dawning of the Easter morn. New hopes arise in the deep, hidden springs of the heart, new joys lend brightness to the eye and color to the cheek, and new love radiates the entire being, [illegible] it descends. The highest type of love is the unselfish, sacrificing variety, and to attain this unalloyed quality we must give.

It is well that we should have days like this of Easter to check us for even a moment in our headlong course in pursuit of the more sordid things of life. Such days are in the nature of resting places where we can refresh ourselves with the purer,

THE NAZARINE

By IMRI ZUMWALT

There was a man who might have been a king
And ruled in all the earth supreme,
He turned his back upon the offered crown
And chose to dwell with humble unknown men
That he might ease the heavy load they bore,
Plant hope and faith in tired human hearts
And lead them up to higher thoughts and lives.
He threw his life away to aid his race,
And was condemned at last and sent to death,
Like any murderer or common thief,
Yet innocent of any charge of guilt
Save that he lived an honest, fearless life
Denouncing wrong in places high or low.
He died with words of love upon his lips,
Forgiving all his foes and faithless friends,
Men said he was a failure, yes, a fool,
To yield a kingdom for a martyr's wreath.
They died, their names and all their deeds are lost;
His name still lives, by multitudes revered
In every land, as deathless as the stars,
And down the centuries still shines the glory
Of far Golgotha and a Roman cross.

DIRECT AID THE THING

It is unfortunate that employers and employes and Republicans and Democrats cannot agree upon the methods of conducting the workmen's compensation department. No one dissents from the proposition that the compensation plan is right and just and sound economies. The employer is willing to pay the cost, charging it to the product. The people who finally pay all the bills are satisfied to contribute. There is every reason why the method of payment should be worked out fairly and to the disadvantage of neither side. The bonding company seems to be the issue. There can be no question that labor leaders have convinced a large number of public officers and a great percentage of the people that the casualty companies do not treat the injured as their employers do. The direct settlement lost a great deal of its force when it meant bargaining between an injured workingman and a bonding company agent. Many doubt that a bonding agent will be governed by the spirit of the law. The merit of direct settlement between employer and employe is lost sight of when the liability company is the party of the second part.

Governor Whitman, however, offset this objection when he called for the Thorn bill which goes a long way toward direct settlement by permitting employers to pay injured workmen any sum they desire on account. Here is direct aid, prompt aid, which is better than direct and prompt settlement. IIt would appear to be the natural thing for the employer to have his cashier or bookkeeper make the payment on account. The wise employer, who realizes that an employe who feels kindly toward him is especially valuable, will by direct aid to the injured, bring his force in close sympathy. The workman who sees his fellow who has been injured considerately treated has a warm spot in his heart for the employer. The Thorn bill affords employers a splendid chance to bind their men to them. Direct aid, the settlement being simply deferred until the state itself declares the award, is the best provision in the entire list pertaining to the operation of the law. The governor has done more for employers than they know in having direct aid incorporated in the law. Every workman will see at a glance his advantage in thep rovision. The governor's own solution of a very difficult problem is to the advantage of the entire state.—Watertown Standard.

clearer air of better things and gain strength, hope and new life from the realization that there is something more in life besides the sordid daily routine, the struggle for the few dollars which are essential to the continuance of the inestimable privilege of toiling and sweating from one day to another. And so—

"On Easter morn
The softened winds to every quickened ear
Breathe music sweet, telling the time of year.
All nature sings, and in glad antiphon,
Blent with the organ's tone,
The voice of man is praise of heaven is borne."

ed to do at Albany, inevitably would limit and weaken it. There is no good reason for the change. There are dozens of good reasons against it. There is no politics in the operation of the department. If there is no politics in the ecort to shift it there must be something even less desirable from the public's point of view—a subtle attempt to break down the efficient detection and punishment of the short-weight artists.

This is a matter which affects every household. The evil of it bears hardest on the very poor—those least able to stand the filching of their hard earned incomes. It is incredible that any legislator who has given a moment's thought to the subject so that he may understand it in the slightest degree should stand for this bold-faced aid to sneak-thievery.

A vote for this bill is a vote against the personal interest of the legislator who casts it, as well as against the interest of every otherc onsumer, for no person, lacking the splendid supervision of weights and measures which the department now gives, can be sure of the honesty of dealers. This bill, jammed through the Senate, should not be jammed through the other house. If the Assembly prove negligent enough of the public's wellbeing to adopt the measure Governor Whitman should veto it.—New York Tribune.

An Aid to Sneak-Thievery

Since Colonial times New York State has had some official form of protection against short-weighters—the meanest thieves on earth. Evolution produced the present Department of Weights and Measures, which has served as a model for similar bureaus in many other states. That department cost the state $19,000 last year. It is estimated that its work saves the consumers—the general public — about $1,000,000 a week.

To abandon that protection or to take any backward step which would weaken it would be an act of incredible stupidity— or worse. To transfer the work of this department to a subordinate bureau in the Department of Agriculture, as it is proposed

A CONVERSION

By DONALD CHAMBERLIN

Having occasion to visit a town in Arizona, where there were no hotel accommodations worthy of the name, I asked a man I met on the street if he could tell me where I could find a lodging in a private house.

"Reckon I kin, stranger," he said. "Come right along with me."

He took me to his own house and introduced me to his wife, a woman with as honest a countenance as ever I saw in man or woman. Several pretty children were playing about who evidently had the care of a good mother. I was given a fine supper, and when the wife took the children upstairs to bed the husband and I sat smoking and chatting together.

"I believe," I remarked, "that you people out here have settled down and become more like those in the east than you used to be."

"Reckon we have. When I drifted into these parts we was all bad except a sprinklin', and they was mostly wimmen and children."

"Surely you were not one of the bad ones," I objected.

He took his pipe out of his mouth and looked at me, apparently wondering if he had better trust me with a confession. I knew his thoughts and by my expression invited confidence.

"Stranger," he said, "I was one o' the goldurnedest, meanest, snivelin', low down critters in the territory. I was mean enough to rob a graveyard of old bones. But I wasn't afraid o' nothin', and when it come to a fight I was thar. Fact is, I was regarded so desp'rit that nobody dast interfere with me. Two sheriffs tried it and failed, and after that I was let alone till I got so bad that the people couldn't stand me, and the committee got after me. That ended my career as a desperado."

"Evidently," I put in, "they didn't hang you or you wouldn't be here telling the story now."

"My story haan't begun. One day when I was about as bad as I could git I went into a house for a meal, which I intended to pay for by takin' anything valuable I could lay my hands on. I run across a young woman and asked her if she could give me a meal o' vittels. 'You just come right in here,' she said, 'and make yerself at home.'

"Waal, that gal cooked me as fine a meal as I ever eat in my life. Anyway, it tasted as good, for I was hungry, and there was somepin about the gal as cooked it that I liked, and when I was eatin' it she was sittin' right opposite me and askin' me all sorts o' questions as innocent-like as if she was talkin' to a respectable party. When I got through with the meal what do you suppose I did? I just told her that I was Bill Hathaway, the noted desperado, and I wanted her to hand out any valuables there might be in the house without troublin' me to find 'em.

"Somehow she didn't look frightened, as most wimmen would look under the circumstances. She got up without sayin' a word, went upstairs and come down with a woolen sock with some coins in the toe and put it on the table before me. Then she looked at me, not with that hateful look I had been used to from wimmen I'd robbed, but with a sorryful look, as much as to say, 'Poor feller, what an awful life you're leadin' and how uncomfortable you'll be some day danglin' from the end of a rope.'

"Somehow I couldn't stummick that sort o' thing. I jist opened the stockin', and instead o' takin' anything out I put my hand in my pocket, tuk out a fist full o' loose change and some bills, rammed 'em into the stockin' and shoved it toward her, tellin' her that she'd given me a bangup good meal and deserved to be well paid for it.

"She turned the stockin' over, dumped all the money in it on the table, counted out what she'd had in it before I put in anything and shoved my amount back to me.

"'We don't take pay from strangers here,' she said, 'and if we did we wouldn't take money that had been gained by robbery.'

"I'd had all sorts o' things said to me, but somehow I'd never had anything like that. They was all either afraid of me and cringed or hated me and spitfired at me. I got up from my chair and went out o' that house like a whipped cur.

"When the next fifth o'me home and found that Bill Hathaway had been there they organized a committee to run me down. It was a long chase, but they finally cornered me. I was full o' tricks, and since none o' those that tuk me knowed me by sight I tole 'em they'd got the wrong man. So they talked together and agreed to take me to the gal I've been tellin' you about for identification.

"They brought me before the house with my arms tied behind my back and a rope around my neck. The gal came out, and they asked her if I was the man that had been to the house before. When she saw the rope she paled a bit and, pretendin' that she wanted to git the dust outer her eyes to see better, drew her apron across 'em. But I knowed it was to get rid of moisture. She looked at me pitiful and at last she said:

"'No; that ain't the one. The other was a villain. This one is a good man if he's ever done anything I'm sure he has repented.'

"Hist," he said, putting a finger to his lips. "[illegible]"

A PRAYER

By I. E. Hyde, Fulton

It's the Sabbath morn and bells are calling
Me to worship God.
Today, I'll rest from toil and strife,
And Allah I will laud.

I'll purify and cleanse my thoughts
From all that's aught but pure;
And while I pray I'll ask my Lord
To bless for evermore.

The lambs who once have gone astray,
But have come home again,
And all the children who have sought
Relief from care and pain.

May God, be very near to them,
And guide their feet with love,
And give them strength, yea, unto death;
Oh, guard their every move.

SPEED LIMITS ARE STILL A NECESSITY

By Francis M. Hugo, Secretary of State.

The more the problem of motoring is studied with the purpose of arriving at some clearly defined conclusion as to the attitued toward it of public opinion, the more confusing becomes the issue. It is not so much a matter of difference of point of view between this person and that, but of the conflicting sensations of the same person under different conditions. If all the sworn haters of motorists could spend a portion of their time inside of a car, instead of always seeing or smelling it from without, their opposition would probably cease.

The attitude of mortorists with regard to speed limits is that while they find no fault with section 287 of the Motor Vehicle Law, calling for care and prudence, according to the conditions and use of the highways and amount of traffic, they do believe that the adoption, under section 288, of arbitrary speed limits in certain localities, regardless of the highway conditions, is absurd and should be abolished.

There has developed much discussion regarding these suggestions, the opponents declaring that there has not been sufficient experience in trying out the law to justify such change at the present time, and that the interests of the general public demand that it should continue to be a part of the law, so that it may be applicable when required.

The opponents appear to have held the field because the law remains unchanged and the regulation maintaining a speed limit holds today. Where the police take action and catch speeders the magistrates impose fines, with occasionally a jail sentence.

This is not a desirable state of affairs from any point of view. Law-breaking, when it becomes habitual, is liable to lead to indifference concerning the rights of the rest of the community, which may change to actual criminality in emergencies. The punishment of an offender who honestly believes that he has not committed any offense, even though the punishment is just, induces recklessness and perversity.

It is supposed by many persons outside the motoring world, as well as within, that the police possess a fierce, untiring desire to catch the motorists exceeding the speed limit, in order to gain credit for themselves.

The police answer that the motorist is pleading his own case. A speed limit, the police believe, is necessary for three reasons. First, because a motorist never tries to check his pace except for an emergency, and habitually goes too fast. Second, because the greater the speed the greater the dust, and until roads are so constructed that dust be abolished, no motorist has a right to increase this intolerable nuisance. Third, the plain issue of a speed limit, is the only one in which it is possible as a rule for the police to prove a clean case for the magistrate.

Whether the police are right or wrong and the speed limit is a safeguard or an absolute rule, it is certain that the non-motoring public will demand more rather than less protection.

COMMUNICATED

Editor Times:

In an address given by Dr. G. E. Stockwell last Sunday morning in the 1st M. E. Church he said, "The Chamber of Commerce is leaving out of their aspirations the principle assets and laying too much stress on inferior ideals such as interior and exterior transportation, etc.

"The foundation of all enterprises should be first to improve the moral and spiritual growth of the city, looking well to the education of the children thereof.

"The Chamber of Commerce should not be founded on the principle of dollars and cents and such a movement is destined for its overthrow unless higher assets are desired. We should consider the betterment of health and physical development of the children and if the Bible is right then we must seek first the Kingdom of God and his righteousness and these other things will be added.

"Therefore, if we consider first the morality and education of the children this will permeate the highest spiritual views of the people and the zenith of their aspirations."

Dr. Stockwell heartily believes in commission form of government with reference to civic advancement and is confident when that air is achieved, our city will begin to grow. His sermons have been enjoyed by a great many during his short sojourn with us and it isw ith deep regret that we see him depart. He is a man who says what he believes and acts according to his principles. Everyone admires a man of that caliber.

Dr. Stockwell leaves us either Tuesday or Wednesday of the comingweek and his Easter message will be the farewell homily to a large majority.

He and his family reside in Fort Plain from which place he came to Fulton and the duties which have been his will be assumed by a new pastor.

He leaves with our best wishes and God's speed but we lose the associations of one of the best friends we have.

A FRIEND.

REMINISCENCES ON THE GROWTH OF FULTON

I was seventy-five years of age on Lincoln's anniversary, the twelfth of February, 1915, whom I voted for in 1864. I have been in touch with Fulton for nearly seventy years. Fifty years ago traveling men use to say that it was one of the most progressive and smartest villages in the states. Now our leading business men are making a tremendous effort to develop our baby city, and as an old stager, I am sitting on the fence to see Fulton grow. The most of my ancestors were Yankees, and natives of Fairfield County, Conn. I first saw daylight in DeRuyter, Madison County, two miles from Quaker Baron, where there was a Quaker church, which was entirely covered with shingle, including the sides. Some of my people believed in that persuasion. They were a plain class of people and believed in living four square lives. In 1855 there was two societies of the Friends in DeRuyter Village. In 1846 my father Augustus S. Gardner, H. C. Gardner and Mrs. H.Gilbert's father, had been for some time doing a large manufacturing business in DeRuyter, turning out wagons, cutters and sleighs and doing a large amount of custom work. That year they succeeded in exchanging their business there for a one hundred and fifty acre farm in Hannibal, Oswego County, with their cousin, Stephen Gardner. At first they thought of going to Missouri but changed their minds and decided to locate their business in Fulton. The transfer of our family was made about April 1st in 1846, with two teams and sleighs. There were no railroads here then and there were many difficulties in moving across the country sixty miles. It was thawing and breaking up and the sleighing thin. In passing in the vicinity of Oneida lake father ascertained that by crossing the lake it would cut off five miles so he drove up to a hotel and made inquiries. The landlord said it would shorten the route but the road across the lake wasn't considered safe as it was thawing and breaking up so fast, and had been condemned for twenty-four hours. In business affairs father was great on dispatch and economy of time, as well as money, so he didn't hesitate a minute but proceeded to cross. His family were very nervous but he was very daring and a great man to take chances, also very determined and sanguine under great discouragements. The water most all the way was two thirds up to the sides of the sleighs. After getting across and out on the main road, father being ahead, and the road being very bad, his load was most upset, and mother, in being in among the goods, had two of her front teeth knocked out. As near as I can calculate we crossed from Bridgeport to Constantia. Finally the last day of the journey, about ten o'clock in the forenoon, we caught a glimpse of Fulton, our future home, coming over the hill from the east. Father stirred around and hired an old brick house with a flat wing in the rear of Willard Johnson's father.

* * *

Last fall when the Hon. John J. Stephens, a walking encyclopedia, of Washington, was here to visit his neice, Mrs. Langdon Foster and family, he told me the brick house burned down in 1850 and that he lived on 2d st., and came up to the fire. There was a pair of stairs attached to the flat wing and mother used to hang her clothes up there. This house, Mr. Stephen's states stood where the second house now stands, north from the corner of Cayuga and S. 3d sts. The next house north was the corner house and was occupied by Rev. C. L. Duning, pastor of the First M. E. church, now the home of Dr. Doane. He was a strong man mentally and physically, weighing perhaps two hundred and twenty-five pounds. His family consisted of himself and wife. and their little son, Charlie, my playmate. The Elder had a powerful voice and we could hear him plainly from our house on Sunday. I attended Sunday school with Charlie and played marbles with him on the street and went with him to a private school in the Baptist church basement in 1846, soon after it was built. It was taught by a maiden lady named Stickney, a sister to Mrs. Quartus Rust. Charlie Duning was the bright boy of the school and the last day was awarded the first prize, a dumb watch, which was considered great by the youth in those days. He was afterwards quartermaster's clerk in the 110th Regiment and died in Key West, Fla.

Father at once purchased a site for a series of shops on the west side of the river at the Lower Falls, on the north side of the west end of the lower bridge on the bank of the river. The old hollow oak tree still stands where I use to go in swimming and fishing some sixty-seven years ago. Father at once bought a large quantity of lumber and hired a gang of men and got right in among them superintending them every minute and it wasn't long before he had up a full set of shops—blacksmith, wagon and paint shops—and was soon turning out wagons, cutters and sleighs and repairing and shoeing horses. The bridge then dropped down to the river bank, footmen and teams being obliged to ascend quite a steep hill. Now it extends and is joined to the summit. A Mr. Rice had a shop on the opposite side of the road in which he worked alone.

Uncle Peter Schenck had an orchard upon the hill, southwest of the shops which contained a harvest sweet tree. Lee Montegue, who died in the Sailors Snug Harbor, in New York, a few years ago, was a young man then and came along one day and persuaded me to go with him and "coon" some of those apples. Uncle Peter Schenck entered a complaint at the shop and I received a good flogging when I got back. I used to cross the lower bridge every Friday through the old toll gate just west of the Genesee Mill, kept at the east end of the bridge by old Mr. Richardson, after the Fulton Patriot. The office was in the corner building up stairs next to the canal, on the north side of Oneida st., but burned down just after the Civil War. [illegible] another building occupied the site where the electric office is [illegible] The widow Giddings and her son, D. B. Giddings, occupy [illegible] now the Howell house, west side, then and ran a fifty acre farm back and west of the house. The son died near Baldwinsville in the fall of 1905, proprietor of a large fruit and truck farm. The old weather beaten district school house stood in front of where the [illegible]s Langdon residence stands. There was an old grocery store [illegible] where Fred Dolbear's store is now located. A family by the name of Wright lived just northeast of the store. He had a grown up son by the name of Newton Wright. On farther north was the same old Walradt homestead, minus two tall trees since cut down. I remember just how old Uncle Walradt looked. He was a tall spare man and wore an old battered silk hat and an old seedy brown pigeon tailed coat. The Marsh brothers had built the brick house where Edward Waugh now lives, and lived in it. Frank Wells lived in the next house. Benjamin Wells lived in an old small red house where the H. C. Gardner house stands. At that time the D. L. & W. railroad was being built and nearly every house was a boarding house for Irish immigrants, just over working on the road. Augustus Northrup's family and the two Schenck families lived just south of the school house. A long steep ridge of a hill with trees on it with a ravine between that and the road was located where the row of Foster houses now stands. John C. Wells lived just below, north on the river road. He was an original character and a man of considerable ability and a public spirited citizen, having served his town on the board of supervisors. He made an excellent presiding officer at political caucuses and conventions. In form and build he was large and muscular and was called the "tall pine of Granby," being some six feet in height. He usually walked along with his head down, being a deep thinker and engaged in thought. A neighbor said to him one day, "Mr. Wells, why don't you straighten up? What makes you walk with your head down?" He turned quickly and said, "Say, my friend, haven't you always noticed in passing a field of waving grain, well loaded that the heads are always bent?" He died in 1906. A short time before he died he told me he had a road scraper my father made for him at our shops.

I remember a band of Indians being encamped up by Fish Lake, now Lake Neahtawanta, engaged in fishing and basket making. One day in the middle of the forenoon there was a rap at the school house door, and the teacher answered the summons and in walked an old squaw with a tin cup of milk and asked the teacher if she couldn't warm it on the stove. She consented and the squaw stood and waited to the amusement of the scholars. One of the teachers at that time was the late Orlando Howell, another teacher was Emily Northrup. Doctors Lee, Livingston and Pardee were the leading physicians then. I remember going up the Chase road and seeing some Indian wigwams on the side of the road. Among the business men doing an extensive business along the river between the upper and lower falls was James Parker. The bank of the river was covered with logs, both sides of his mill, which were drawn from several miles back in the country. In 1855, during a winter term I was in school at Falley Seminary and evenings I used to sit in the Jones grocery where my cousin, William G. Gage, was clerking, and listen to Jim Parker's reminiscences of his life. At times he had speels of being intemperate. Then again he would brace up and be successful in business for some twelve years before giving away again, and he would go around the country at intervals giving temperance lectures, accompanied by his daughter, Rose, who sang temperance songs. They came out to South Hannibal once.

Asa Phillips kept the hotel at the Upper Falls which was called Phillipsville. My father had one of his best mechanics run away one night, claiming to the boys that he couldn't sleep nights on account of the roaring of the falls. Now, the artificial cement falls doesn't roar any more. A long white canal boat with green blinds called a packet, drawn by four horses was the principal and fastest conveyance, aside from these stages. On approaching the landing the Captain would stand on the bow and give a few blasts on a long tin horn, as a signal to have the mail and passengers ready.

John C. Harroun, one of Fulton's early successful business men in the early part of his career, was said to be a Captain on a packet. Te afterwards became a large contractor and lumberman. He had a large steam saw mill down on the river bank above the Upper Falls, opposite the Bowens Corners road. I remember of seeing him as a very energetic go-head man with a pair of rubbers on, out on the Bowens Corners road with men and teams attached to a large snow scraper clearing the roads six miles to his hundred acre wood job. Today some of the same lively blood courses through the veins of his bradson, J. Harroun Howe, one of the leading business men of Fulton.

In the early fifties the firm of A. S. & H. A. Gardner at the Lower Falls dissolved partnership, my father buying out his brother's interest in their Hannibal farm.

Col. Jas. Vohriess, a tall energetic business man, who was called the "tall pine of Lysander," was an extensive owner of real estate in Lysander, Granby and Oswego Falls. O. R. Jacox and John U. Smith, were the Colonel's son-in-laws, and business men at the Upper Falls. Also the Hoes and Henry Broadwell might be included with them.

We lived a year and a half on the east side and while there I saw a General Training Day in the Park. We then moved over to the Lower Falls, into the Benjamin Wells house.

I have watched the growth of Fulton for about seventy years and there hasn't been many weeks in that time that my father or I didn't visit Fulton. We have spent a good many thousand dollars here, for flour, feed, groceries, dry goods, clothing, implements and machinery for a large general purpose farm. The South Hannibal cheese factory was a large stock company for years. My father was president for five years and I was also for five years, and we bought all of the furnishings here. On the other hand we have received a good many thousand dollars for butter, eggs, cheese, potatoes, pork and grain here. All of this business has helped the growth of Fulton. We have had a number of relatives here, and exchanged visits for years. During the Civil war I was a member of the 110th Regiment, three years and twenty days. I attended school at Falley Seminary in 1855 and also in 1866. I went to Professor John P. Griffin one morning and told him I wanted to be excused on account of rheumatism. He said, "Gardner, there is just one remedy for it, that is to just grin and bear it."

We moved to Fulton again about eleven years ago, having disposed of our farm. In the seventy years I have watched to see Fulton grow, I have actually seen nearly all of the improvements and blessings we enjoy today come to pass, under my observation.

BIRD PROTECTION LAW STILL EFFECTIVE

Washington, D. C., April 3.—Many of the press comments on the decision of the United States District Court rendered March 20, at Topeka, Kan., holding that the Federal migratory bird law is unconstitutional, according to the United States Department of Agriculture, are erroneous and are apt to mislead the public concerning the real situation in this matter.

The Kansas decision, like a former decisions to the same effect in the eastern district of Arkansas, is limited in its operation solely to the district in which it was rendered. Neither decision settles or nullifies the law, and the exact contrary has been held by the United States District Court for South Dakota. The Arkansas case has been appealed to, and is now pending in the United States Supreme Court. The act of Congress protecting migratory birds stands effective until the Supreme Court finally decides the question of its constitutionality. In the meantime, it is incumbent on every law-abiding citizen to observe its provisions and the regulations. It is the duty of the Department of Agriculture to enforce this law and the officials in charge will endeavor to do so as long as it is in force. Reports of violations will be carefully investigated and when sufficient evidence is secured they will be reported for prosecution. In this connection it should not be forgotten that an offender against this, as in the case of other United States laws, is subject to prosecution any time within three years from the date the offense is committed.

AUTO FOR THE FIRE STATION

Fire Chief Waugh Will Give Automobile Chemical Engine a Trial Next Week

The Fulton fire department will put a new automobile chemical truck into service early next week, according to an announcement made by Chief Harry Waugh this morning. The automobile belongs to one of the members of the department and it will be fitted with chemical tanks and extinguishers and will answer all first alarms. The fire laddies are busy today repairing the large doors of the steamer room, where the new motor apparatus will be stored. The doors are being fitted with the springs that throw the doors from the driver's seat, and the steamer will be moved out of the way.

Probably seventy per cent of the fires in this city require the use of chemical tanks only. The automobile will be able to reach the scene in half the time that the horse-drawn apparatus can, and with the hose wagon following it, ifneeded better and quicker fire protection will be given the residents, especially those near the city limits.

Chief Waugh is enthusiastic at the prospect of the new apparatus and, while it is only an experiment, all the members of the department are anxious to see the machine installed and given its first tryout.

WE WILL BE READY for business in our new quarters in the former post-office block early next week. Prompt and careful service.

WARRANT OUT FOR SILVERMAN

Local Bankrupt Still Missing. Creditors of Pike Met Today in Oswego

The final meeting of the creditors of Barney Silverman, voluntary bankrupt, who formerly conducted a clothing business on 1st st., was held this morning in Oswego. Silberman's assets are practically nothing and his liabilities amount to $5,000.

A little more than three years ago, he filed a petition in bankruptcy and stated hsi assets. It was alleged by his creditors that he had concealed assets amounting to $2100. An order of the court was issued to make him produce these assets, and shortly after receiving the order, Silverman packed up and left town and he has not been heard from since. A warrant for contempt of court was issued against him and attempts are being made now to locate him. The creditors will plan measures today to apprehend him and to recover the concealed assets.

PIKE'S ASSETS DO NOT RUN HIGH IN VALUE

The first meeting of the creditors of Charles J. Pike, farmer and salesman of Volney town, who was adjudged a bankrupt in December, was held in Oswego this morning at 10.30 o'clock. A trustee will be elected and the matter of straightening out Mr. Pike's badly tangled affairs will be begun.

Pike was adjudged a bankrupt early in December largely through the efforts of a large fertilizing manufacturing company, from whom he had purchased consignments of fertilizer. The company will be represented by Attorney A. J. Jennings at the meeting this morning. The other creditors of Pike were largely Fulton merchants and neighboring farmers from whom he borrowed money.

Shortly after he was adjudged a bankrupt, Pike left for parts unknown and nothing further has been heard of him. It is alleged that he transferred about $800 in real and personal property to his father the day before he left. He also has a small equity in a farm in Volney and these are the only assets which the creditors hope to be able to share. Pike's father lives in Medina, N. Y.

RUNAWAY HORSE; NO ONE INJURED

A horse, attached to a farm wagon owned by J. H. Stoddard, bolted last night while crossing the canal bridge. Mr. Stoddard tried to turn the horse toward the side of theb ridge and the animal turned completely around breaking the whiffle tree and overturning the wagon. The occupants were thrown out but were not seriously injured. Several men caught the horse before he could do further damage. After repairing the wagon Mr. Stoddard continued on his way.

AUTO SKIDDED

A 1915 model Inter-State automobile, the owner of which refused to tell his name, skidded on the wet pavement in front of J. C. O'Brien's store yesterday afternoon and crashed against the curb, completely wrecking the right hand rear wheel. The occupants of the car, although badly frightened, were not injured. The owner, who is not a Fultonian, left the car against the curb all night and it was removed early this morning.

EARL SAFFORD BURIED

The body of Earl Safford, formerly of this city, who died in New York city April 1, will arrive in Fulton today on the afternoon train and the funeral wil lbe held shortly afterward from the chapel in Mt. Adnah cemetery, Rev. M. G. Buchoof the Baptist church, will officiate.

Mr. Safford is survived by a sister, Miss Gertrude Safford, who resides on Oneida st., and his wife, who was formerly Miss Grace Morton, of this city.

BARTHOLOMAY EFFECTS SOLD THIS MORNING

Attorney Hubert L. Gilman sold at 10 o'clock this morning in Oswego all the effects of the Bartholomay Fruit Co., bankrupts. Mr. Gilman was appointed trustees some time ago and the matter was finally cleared up with the sale today. The firm had assets amounting to $500 and liabilities totaling in the neighborhood of $5,000.

TIE UP YOUR BICYCLE

Friday morning at the early hour of 2:30 when Bert Painter was about to start to join his ship on the Burgard fleet below Battle Island he looked about the front porch where he had left his bicycle the night before, but could not locate it. The wheel evidently had been stolen during the night and Painter was in for a four-mile hike down the West River road to the landing place below stop 33. During that long and lonesome journey Painter not only had a fine chance to study astronomy, but he also had time to plan his descent on the department of police later in the day.

Accordingly at 3 p.m. the same day found Painter up stairs in the police quarters, stamping around, demanding quick action on the part of the force. Of course he admitted that the front porch was not a very safe place for a wheel to remain nights, but he said that with such a vigilant police force there should be no trouble whatever in locating the wheel and the theif. Robert Neyhart, messenger for the Western Union, also lost a wheel this week under similar circumstances. The police department are making every effort to locate the stolen property.

BIG GUNS COMING FOR OSWEGO PARK

Were Used in War of 1812; Are Eight Feet Long and Weigh Half Ton Each.

According to last night's Oswego Times, Congressman L. W. Mott has received word from the chief of the Ordnance Department of the United States army to the effect that two cannon have been designated for ornaments in Montcalm Park, to be placed there under the jurisdiction of the Fort Oswego Chapter of the D. A. R. With the cannon arrangements have also been made for eighty twelve pound cannon balls to form part of the ornamentation.

The two cannon are some eight feet long and are built of bronze, weighing in the neighborhood of a ton and a half each. They are at present stored at the United States arsenal at Watervliet, but the commandant of the arsenal has been notified that this artillery has been given to Oswego and ordered to prepare the guns for shipment.

The guns in question are relics of the War of 1812 and will be highly prized here, where no little fighting was done at that time. It is unfortunate that cannon of the Revolutionary period could not be obtained, but all of these had been given out years ago. It is considered a piece of very good fortune that Congressman Mott has been able to obtain guns as old as the War of 1812 for at the present time most of the cannon used for the decoration of historical places are those which saw service during the Civil War.

The complete history of the two guns which are to be sent to Oswego was not contained in the letter announcing the designation, but it will be sent on here a little later, so that suitable tablets can be prepared.

CANAL TO BE OPEN MAY 15

General Wotherspoon, of State Board, Inspected Work Here Yesterday

General W. W. Wotherspoon, state superintendent of public works, announced yesterday that the Oswego canal would be open for traffic for the first time in four years not later than May 15. This announcement came after the General, accompanied by Alfred M. O'Neil and W. D. Dodge of the department, had completed an inspection tour of the canal from Syracuse to Oswego by automobile. The party stopped here and inspected the work and also at Phoenix and Minetto. The inspection revealed nothing that would lead General Wotherspoon to change the opening day and he stated that conditions were very favorable all along the line.

The Oswego canal will only be open to boats drawing six feet of water or less, and the ordinary canal boat will come under this ruling. The pleasure boat traffic that used to pass through the Oswego canal until it was closed by the barge canal work a few years ago, will probably welcome the opening of the canal as much as the freight handlers. Pleasure boat owners from below Syracuse who wished to reach Lake Ontario and the St. Lawrence river have been compelled for four years past to go to Lake Erie and then through the Welland Canal to Lake Ontario.

The list of lock tenders and lockmasters who passed the recent civil service examination has just been made public and it is expected that the appointments will be made sometime this month in order that those who secure the positions will be able to familiarize themselves with the electric machinery before the canal opens.

Last month many applicants from this vicinty for the positions of lock masters, assistant lock masters and lock operators spent a whole day in Syracuse taking the civil service examinations scehduled for these good canal positions.

The position of lock master is one of supervision over three locks and draws a salary of $1500 to $1800.

The positions of assistant lock master for an electrical machine to take charge of one lock and draws a salary of $1200 to $1500.

The position of lock operator calls for men to take night shifts on each lock and draws a salary of $900 to $1200.

The re-opening of the canal will mean a great deal to the city and, in fact, all the towns along the line. The pleasure boat traffic is especially to be desired and the convenient handling of freight goods will also be appreciated by shippers at both ends of the canal and along its course.

General Wotherspoon has planned several inspection trips along the canal this summer and it is expected that a general inspection will be made shortly after the canal is opened for traffic.

LARGE CROWD HEARS PRIEST

Father Sheehan, of Syracuse, Spoke on "The Passion of Christ."

A throng of worshipers that filled every seat in the edifice and overflowed into the aisles, attended the Good Friday services last night at the Church of the Immaculate Conception. Rev. Father Sheehan of the Church of St. John the Baptist, Syracuse, delivered the sermon. The choir sang two hymns without the accompaniment of the organ, which was closed during the services Thursday not to be opened again until this morning. The Rosary was recited and, after the sermon, Father Lindsmann read the Meditation on the Seven Last Words.

Father Sheehan briefly told the story of Calvary and outlined the sufferings and death of Christ. He said that Christ, in the garden of Gesthemane, was confronted by a vision of the Jews crucifying Him, an dthe sufferings and insults He was about to undergo, but that His greatest anguish was caused by a vision of the sins of the world from the beginning until the end of time. Christ suffered most of all to see countless thousands for whom he was to die in vain and who who would reject Him and His teachings and rush headlong to destruction despite His great sacrifice. Father Sheehan also told of the Apostles who deserted Christ in His time of trial and urged His hearers never to desert Christ or their religon when either was assailed.

Out of Line.

An enlisted man at the post at Fort Leavenworth was ordered to the range for the first time for target drill. Out of twenty-one chances the newcomer made never a hit.

"Oh, you dub!" exclaimed an officer standing near. "You've missed the target every time! What's the matter?"

"Well, sir," answered the recruit nonchalantly, "the only reason I can think of at present is that the person who set up my target hasn't placed it in a straight line from here."

Too Horrible to Contemplate.

"No, Mr. Upp," Phyllis said, with a sigh, "I cannot marry you. I confess that I have much more than a friendly feeling for you, but suppose we were to marry and you should die and leave me in straitened circumstances and I should take in boarders and they should make a pun of my name as landlady, calling me Phyllis Upp?"—London Tray Stories.

Favorite Lingering Place of Washington Sightseers

We know all about how the Nation's heroes fought, but how did they when they were not fightin? Once that question was not important. Today it is. Once history was a record of warfare. Today it includes a record of the daily life of the Nation.

Gradually the past is being reconstructed. In this country that highly interesting work is carried on by the United States National Museum, which is growing to be one of the favorite lingering places of Washington sightseers.

The first building expressly erected for the National Museum was not opened to the public until October, 1881, and from that date until the occupation of the new building, contained many of the stepping stones of American history.

Upon the opening of the new building the collections were divided, the natural history exhibits being removed to the new building while the older building retained the arts and industries exhibits.

One of the striking features of the older building is the unique American period costume collection of 19 dresses belonging to successive hostesses of the White House from the time of Martha Washington that of a recent administration.

These costumes are so exhibited on lay figures as to bring out the full effects of the gowns, although no efforts have been made to reproduce the faces of the individuals.

Several other dresses and a great number of accessories of apparel, including shawls, shoes, hats and bonnets, gloves, handkerchiefs, combs, fans and jewelry are also on display.

Among the costumes and uniforms of American men shown are a uniform of George Washington, a court suit of Gen. Thomas Pinckey, the court dress and other attire of James Monroe, and the uniform coat of Gen. Andrew Jackson, worn at the battle of New Orleans.

Historical furniture, which at one time or another was the property of men of national importance—Lafayette, Jefferson, Putnam, Hamilton, Gansevoort, Cropper, and others—is displayed in two large wall cases. There are many other pieces installed in the individual exhibits.

Colonial relics deposited by the National Society of the Colonial Dames of America fill two large cases. Two others contain similar records of a later period, deposited by the National Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution.

Among the many family collections two of special note are those of the Gansevoort and Bailey-Myers-Mason families, which contain costumes, swords and other relics, covering nearly 100 years' service of these old military lines.

The printing press used in 1725-26 by Benjamin Franklin, when a printer in London, is especially interesting in connection with this noted gentleman, as well as its historical importance as regards the development of the art of printing.

Models of five sailing vessels connected with the discovery and early history of America represent a viking ship, such as the Norsemen used in their supposed early visits to this country about 1000 A. D.

Here we find also the Santa Maria, flagship of Columbus; the Susan Constant, which brought the first permanent English colony to America; the Mayflower of the Pilgrims, and the United States frigate Constitution, the inspiration of the stirring poem, "Old Ironsides."

The War of 1812 and the Mexico War are represented by flags, swords, pistols, etc. Associated with the Civil War, the Indian wars and the Spanish war are a number of mementoes of great interest.

Morse, inventor of the telegraph; Langley, the genius who thought out the aeroplane, and many other inventors, have places of honor.

SUBNORMAL RACE IN EUROPE AFTER WAR.

Brain Loss Due to Shock More Serious Than Wounds.

Europe will be peopled with a race of subnormal men after the war, according to Miss Amy Rowland, aid to Dr. George W. Crile, noted surgeon, of Cleveland. Miss Rowland arrived in New York on board the Arabic of the White Star line, from Liverpool, and goes to join Dr. Crile, who also returned recently from the front, where he was connected with the American Ambulance hospital.

"Of the thousands of soldiers examined by Dr. Crile," Miss Rowland said, "every one evinced evidences of a permanent loss of brain power. The fright and shock they had suffered had impaired the brain tissue and in some cases had made idiots of them.

"The thousands of cripples who will be foisted on the suffering countries when the war ends will not by any means be the most serious consequences of the conflict. Dr. Crile found that in the cases of all the soldiers examined.

"In addition to the mental effect which will make those men subnormal for the balance of their lives Dr. Crile conducted researches into the physical effect of shock and fright on the human body. Previously the surgeon had made examinations of the effects of the same sensations on animals, a work which is widely known to the medical profession. It was found that in every case the effects of the sensations on men and animals are identical. There is an impairing of the nervous force, besides the gross physical effect."

SUNDAY GOLF FOR WISCONSIN.

Ban on Movies Also Lifted in Blue Law Amendment.

Official recognition will be given to Sunday golf in Wisconsin by the proposed amendment to the blue laws, which will lift golf from the list of proscribed Sunday sports and which will make formally legal some of the amusements which were not dreamed of when the Wisconsin Sunday laws were passed.

The Heim bill, amending the blue laws, provides that moving picture theaters can be considered exempt from the list of things forbidden on Sunday, and another amendment has been sent in by the committee which exempts golf and baseball and other sports as long as they do not disturb the peace of a community.

BET ON A LONG WAR.

One of the most famous betting books in London is a musty volume wherein members of the Brooks club have recorded for more than a century and a quarter their wagers upon all sorts of questions, including the duration of a war or the fall of a ministry. The last bet appearing in its pages is £50 to £5 that the present war will be over before five years.

Among earlier entries, when odds were laid and taken upon the duration of the war with the American colonies and the outcome of the struggle with France, the name of Charles James Fox continually appears.

SIR W. ROBERTSON IS CHIEF OF STAFF

Has Been Highly Efficient British Quartermaster General.

PRAISED BY GENERAL FRENCH

Won Distinction in Field in Several Previous Wars—Recent Duties With Him Fashion Will Add to English Glories, and He Will Accompany to the Great Task of Pleasing the Army.

London.—Major General Sir William Robert Robertson, now serving as quartermaster general on the staff of Field Marshal Sir John French, with temporary rank of lieutenant general, has been promoted to be the chief of the imperial general staff to succeed Major General Sir Archibald James Murray.

No explanation was given why General Murray is to be succeeded by General Robertson. Twice in the present war General Murray has been mentioned in reports. In September General French spoke of him as having been one of those who had "worked day and night unceasingly, with the utmost skill, self sacrifice and devotion." In October General French again added him to his roll of honor.

in the field was highly praised in a dispatch by Sir John French, who said that he "met what appeared to be almost insuperable difficulties with his characteristic energy, skill and determination."

While Sir John, for the most part, has to consider the ground in front of him, Sir William Robertson has had to keep in touch not only with the ground covered by the expeditionary force, but with the centers of supply at home. He must know the lay of Ypres, but he must know a great deal about Birmingham and Manchester as well.

His is the case of a man prepared. His line of business ever since he looked after the railway transport during the Miranzai and Black Mountain expeditions twenty-three years ago has had to do with the care of soldier men.

His first regiment was the Third Dragoon guards, which he entered in 1888. After doing useful transport work in the Black mountains he was promoted to staff captain and D. A. Q. M. G. of the intelligence branch at Simla. For four years he worked hard at the provisioning and quartering of men in India. He has worked at the same subjects in several parts of the world.

In 1895 he acted as intelligence officer to the headquarters staff of the Chitral relief force. Mentioned in dispatches and severely wounded, he got his D. S. O. at the end of the campaign and was pounced upon by the war office for its own service.

With his wife, whom he met in India, and who is the daughter of another distinguished soldier (the late Lieutenant General T. C. Palin), he settled down for a short time to town life, but to a town life that was never for a moment oblivious to the interests of camp and field.

With the outbreak of hostilities in South Africa he was very soon called upon to take up his duties as an active overseer of the discipline of the British forces on active service.

After South Africa Sir William was booked for seven years by a war office very desirous of reform.

Afterward he went to Aldershot as assistant quartermaster general. Aldershot, of all places, was the right school for one who had to prepare for European complications.

Sir Archibald Murray, the retiring chief of the general staff, also has a long, honorable record as a soldier for nearly forty years. He entered the Twenty-seventh regiment in 1879, became a captain in the Royal Inniskilling fusiliers in 1887 and was rapidly promoted until four years ago he was made major general.

Senator Simmons Says Deficit Amounts to $28,000,000.

MAKES DETAILED STATEMENT

Chairman of Finance Committee of Senate Gets Up Table of Alarming Figures—Poor Business Due to European War Is Chief Factor in Lowering Receipts—Gets Brighter Days Ahead.

Washington.—Senator Simmons, chairman of the finance committee, does not think the treasury deficit will be excessive and is not alarmed over that or money to run the government.

"There have been so many conflicting statements with reference to the probable deficit in the revenue of the present fiscal year, some persons placing it as $190,000,000, some as high as $130,000,000," said he, "I have thought it well to look thoroughly into the situation with a view to ascertaining what were the real facts. During the past few weeks I have been in conference with officials of the treasury department, and I feel safe in saying the probable deficit will not much exceed $28,000,000.

"This does not include the expenditures on account of the Panama canal. These are otherwise provided for by law and are not required to be paid out of the current funds of the government. Estimated receipts of the government from all sources as made in September, 1913, were as follows:

"From customs, $240,000,000; internal revenue, $806,000,000; corporation and income tax, $122,000,000; miscellaneous, $80,000,000. Total receipts, $736,000,000. The probable net ordinary expenditures were estimated at $718,000,000, showing an estimated excess of receipts of $18,000,000.

"The receipts from practically every source have fallen below the estimate, due to depressed business conditions on account of the war in Europe. Although the revenue derived from the internal revenue tax will probably be increased by the emergency revenue act over the estimate by about $20,000,000, there was on March 15, 1915, an excess of ordinary expenditures over receipts of approximately $66,000,000 against a deficit of $24,000,000 on the same date last year.

"The estimated receipts for the remainder of the fiscal year are: From customs, $72,000,000; internal revenue, $97,000,000; corporation and income tax, $76,000,000; miscellaneous receipts, $21,000,000, a total of $266,000,000. The ordinary disbursements will amount to $207,000,000. An excess of receipts over expenditures for the remainder of the year of $59,000,000. This shows a net deficit at the end of the fiscal year of about $26,000,000.

"The increases are due, in part, to the normal growth of the government and in part are due to conditions arising out of the European war and the abnormal conditions in Mexico. When the facts that the income tax is not required to be paid by law until about the end of the fiscal year (June 30), and that the bulk of this tax is not, in fact, paid until about the end of the fiscal year are considered, the circumstance of an excess of disbursement over receipt for the first half of the year, and an excess of receipts over disbursements during the last half, will be readily understood, and it will also be apparent that any estimate based upon the assumption that the proportion of the receipts and disbursements will be the same during the second half of the year as during the first half is both misleading and erroneous."

SIXTY MILES OF BOOKS.

Harvard's Widener Memorial Library Now Nearing Completion.

Boston.—Sixty miles of shelves, capable of holding 2,500,000 volumes, have been put in place in the Harry Elkins Widener Memorial library at Harvard. The work of finishing the interior of the new $2,000,000 structure is now in its last stages, and the dedication will probably take place during commencement week in June.

A large force of workmen is now engaged in putting the finishing touches on the main reading room. The ceiling decorations are nearly completed. The color of the ceiling, as well as the polished stone pillars and side columns, is a deep yellow.

WHEAT SOLUTION SUGGESTED

Chicago.—"You Americans certainly are a queer sort," exclaimed P. E. Quinn, deputy trade commissioner of Australia, who is in this city.

"Here you have the greatest wheat resources in the world, and your people are paying an exorbitant price for the main necessary of life.

"How different you are from New South Wales! With the outbreak of war the government bought up all wheat at $1.20 a bushel, and it has remained at that price ever since."

An Acrobatic Victory.

Paris.—The French won a victory on the heights on the Meuse above Verdun by climbing a cliff on scaling ladders, the artillery keeping the Germans busy while they did their acrobatic stunt.

About Sports Generally

By Frank G. Menke

Barney Dreyfuss accompanied his Piratical outfit to Hot Springs a few seasons ago and annoyed his men one night by appearing in evening clothes.

After dinner, Barney sat on one of the chairs out on the lawn and made himself very agreeable to the ladies. That annoyed his players still more. So they hatched a little plot.

Three of the players got newspapers, soaked them in water, then wadded them into balls and climbed into the steeple of the hotel that overlooked the lawn where Barney was sitting. When the sharpshooting trio had reached its goal one of the fellow-conspirators stood alongside of Barney and lit a few matches so as to give the range to the sharpshooters.

And then the bombardment began. Nine paper wads were hurled down at Barney. Five missed—but four hit the mark. And one of the four plunked onto the expansive shirt bosom of Barney and transformed it into a shapeless mass of waterlogged linen.

Barney, according to the account of the affair, retired to his boudoir and did not leave it until the next day.

A Quaint Character.

Those who knew Dreyfuss best have found him a character almost as quaint as was old Chris Von Der Ahe, "de bresident of der Saind Louis' Browns." Barney is the target at which his own players have aimed many jokes.

De Ain't None.

Last spring one of the Pittsburgh Newspaper men dropped in on Barney, who was engrossed at the moment in looking at the sporting page of the particular paper for which the caller worked.

"How-de-do," said Barney. "Say, what's the matter with your paper, hey? What's the matter?"

"Whaddaya mean—what's the matter?" asked the writer.

"Look!" exhorted Barney.

He held up the sporting page. About all the big headlined items concerned the Feweral League. Organized baseball drew a headline on only on item, and that was a small one.

"Give a look," said Barney. "Federal League here—Federal League there—Federal League everywhere. What's the matter with you fellows, hey, printing so much about the Federal League? Bah! Vat foolishness. Why, der ain't no Federal League."

* * *

No one, with the exception of President John H. Farrell of the New York State League appears to be in a position to throw any light on the situation as to what is holding up the league meeting. A few weeks ago Mr. Farrell stated that several important questions would have to be settled before a call could be issued for a pow-wow. The atmosphere of silence about the Auburn office of the league official is apparently undisturbed by the requests from club owners and managers for information as to the date when plans will be made for the opening of the 1915 season.

Long before this time last year managers were assembling to oversee workout sessions. A schedule had been adopted and arrangements were under way for a season of activity around the circuit.

This year most of the club owners and pilots do not appear to know when the training season will start, or even the date for the opening of the playing season.

The questions of managers for all of the teams has been settled John C. Calhoun will lead the Bingos again; Lew Wachter has been engaged to pilot Troy; Joe O'Rourke is the selection of Owner Winchester for Albany; Mike O'Neil will guide the destines of the Stars; Wid Conroy has been retained at Elmira; Pete Noonan at Wilkes-Barre, Bill Coughlin at Scranton and Utica will present a team under the watchful eyes of Eddie McDonough.

Many of the clubs are equipped with a goodly bunch of talent from which to select teams for the race, while a few pilots are waiting for the big league clubs to unload rookies, a number of whom will find their way to the cities of the circuit.

The attitude of several veteran players in refusing to sign contracts is not going to affect the league to any great extent. It happens that the 1915 crop of players out of work is so large that all of the State League club managers are showered with letters from first-class ball performers seeking berths.

Under these circumstances no trouble will be experienced in gathering together choice collections of players for rspective positions on each team.

The men who hold out will likely not be urged to come on unless they show a desire to play for the salaries offered.

Bunions and Rank.

"It is extraordinary," writes Sir Henry Drummond Wolff in "Rambling Recollections," "to observe in England the weakness that most people have for boasting of their friends in high places and the deference that they show to them. The daughter of a lady of very high rank had some pain in her foot which the mother asked the governess to be good enough to look at. The latter after examining it said, 'If it were not for her ladyship's exalted rank I should say it was a bunion.'"

HEART INTEREST STORIES FROM TRENCHES AND BATTLEFIELDS

BY mail and in dispatches from old world newspapers there have arrived in this country human interest stories of the great war in Europe. Some of the latest and best are here given:

"If I am lucky enough to survive this war I am afraid that I will be satisfied with very little, just a bed and a crust of bread," writes a twenty-year old Belgian soldier to his brother, Paul L. Herz, a diamond cutter, of 284 Pearl street, New York city. Young Herz is serving with the Fourth regiment of Belgian infantry.

The letter was made public by the Belgian relief committee. It bears a February date and in part reads:

"Although for more than six months we have lived like savages, remaining four nights without sleeping and eight days without washing, and have fallen into ice cold water and kept our wet clothes on for days, I have never felt the slightest attack of illness nor even had a cold. We live absolutely like Indians in the bushes and are occupied in all professions, such as carpenter, cook, digger, laundress and shoemaker.

"As for the life in the trenches, in which we spend four days out of every eight, it is at times frightful, especially as since quite a while our trenches along the Yser near Nieuport have been bombarded night and day. Shells and shrapnel pass by, whistling, without ceasing. Sometimes they fall at fifty meters, then again at ten or five inches from us. Then again one falls flush in the trench. Then we pick up our poor comrades and repair the parapet. Then we wait for our turn to come.

"The inundation prevents us from advancing, and when we are called upon to do advance post duty we often wade in ice cold water up to the belt. Our trenches in spots are less than 400 meters from the Germans, and we always have to be on the alert.

"A couple of days ago I was called upon to guard a bridge which was mined with dynamite by our own Belgian sappers, when I noticed that the Germans were directing their gunfire upon the bridge. The second shell was fifty meters short, but the third was too long. I heard the shot of the next. After two seconds the shell announced itself by its horrible whistling; then a black cloud, a frightful explosion, and I was flung on my back. Once more I got up, unharmed. The bridge did not blow up, only a hole in the flooring. I found this moment particularly horrible, inasmuch as I was certain that before five minutes would elapse I would be up with the bridge, and I could not move from my position because I had been stationed there.

"One gets completely demoralized at times and allows oneself to live like a brute, like an unconscious being. However, at times we sing and play cards and laugh at the slightest provocation."

New York Girl's Experience.

The experience of a retreating army pursued by a victorious army was shared by a New York girl when the left wing of the Austrians was driven out of Lemberg by the Cossacks.

Miss Bertha Zwillich, who lives with her brother, Samoel Zwillich, at No. 1000 Prospect avenue, the Bronx, New York city, was visiting relatives at Boryslav, in northern Galicia, when the Cossacks invaded the Lemberg region. Boryslav was in the rear of the Austrian left wing, which was supposed to be the strongest. But the terrific onslaught of the Cossacks smashed it, and the Austrian army was driven back into the Carpathians.

Miss Zwillich, with hundreds of refugees, went with the Austrians, tramping for weeks with the army and eating the same food as the soldiers.

"For days and days," says Miss Zwillich, "I walked and ran with hundreds of other refugees, as we fled toward Budapest. We were right with the retreating army itself, and we ate daily with the soldiers. We all shared alike. Then we reached Uzsok pass, in the Carpathians. There I saw a number of horrors that I don't like to think of.

"I saw two men, a woman and a twelve-year-old girl shot down by stray bullets while I was in the streets of Uzsok. The Russians caught up with us very close there, and down in the town we could look up on the mountain tops near by and see the shells bursting almost over us. I was an eyewitness of the fierce encounter of Uzsok pass.

"After that we tramped on in the same direction—toward Budapest and Vienna. We took turns walking and riding in carts. Clothing and the few things we could snatch up as we left our homes we carried with us. For more than two weeks this terrible strain kept up. At one town we stopped for a rest, but there was an outbreak of cholera, and again we started on our flight. At last we reached a railroad and were transported in freight cars to Budapest. I saw some things so horrible that I will never speak of them.

"I have twenty cousins, all in the Austrian army. The Galicians did not want war at all, but, once in it, they said: 'We will win. We must win.' And that is still their cry and their spirit. In a letter I have just received from Budapest I am told that my uncle, forty-two years old, has not been called to the colors and that conditions are very good. My relatives have received mail from the garrison at Przemysl by the aeroplane post. They say the garrison is holding out splendidly."

Miss Zwillich left New York last May to visit relatives in Boryslav. She was forced to leave nearly all of her clothing behind in Boryslav. When she reached Vienna she was cared for by the American consul there. In Vienna she spent some weeks making cigarettes for the soldiers and then volunteered for the Austrian Red Cross.

A Miraculous Escape.

"I am now permitted to state that the artillery attached to the East Lancashire division of territorials was sharply engaged on the Suez canal during the fighting of Feb. 3 and Feb. 4," writes an English correspondent.

"The behavior of the men under fire and the skill with which the guns were served were considered worthy of very high praise.

"An officer controlling the fire of one of the territorial batteries in these engagements displayed conspicuous gallantry. In order to find the ranges with the greatest possible accuracy he climbed a date palm tree near by and remained there an hour while the position was bombarded with shrapnel. When the fire became too hot he took up a fresh position in another palm tree and remained there till the close of the battle.

"One territorial gunner had a remarkable escape. A shrapnel bullet passed down the barrel of the gun he was serving and flattened itself against a part of the breech mechanism without doing any damage either to man or gun."

"Hobson's Choice."

Alfred Capus, co-editor of the Figaro, in a lecture on "The Press During the War" gave the following as a typical dialogue between the censor and an editor over the telephone:

"About midnight the censor said:

"It would be very nice of you, monsieur, to suppress these few lines. I ask you as a personal favor."

The editor then demanded to know what would happen. "If I refuse."

"If you refuse," answered the censor, "I shall be obliged, to my deepest mortification, to interrupt your publication."

M. Capus also told an anecdote of a war correspondent of the Figaro in 1870 who asked a certain general to be allowed to approach the operations so as to obtain a better view. The general refused the request, whereupon the correspondent retorted, "Then I shall not mention your battle in my paper."

Royalty on Firing Line.

A dispatch to the London Daily News from an unnamed point in France describes a visit of the Prince of Wales to the firing line.

"A major led the way,' it says, 'and immediately behind was a short, slight figure clad in regulation khaki. He was wearing a 'British warm' with the collar turned up and a Sam Brown belt and revolver. His boots were covered with mud.

"Following were two or three staff officers. The major explained the nature of the defenses at this point and then from a spy hole pointed out the German lines about 500 yards distant, with our front line trenches between. Occasional bullets cracked overhead, and the Prince of Wales was actually on the firing line. He listened eagerly to the explanations, and after a stay of a few minutes the party returned."

"Hen Wlad Fy Nhadau!"

An English soldier writing from the trenches near Dixmude says:

"It was a miserable night. A heavy rain had filled the trenches. Suddenly out of the darkness came a voice. It was a Welsh ballad called 'Hob y Deri Dando,' sang in a fine tenor voice. It was the cheeriest sound I ever heard. At the end a round of applause came down the trenches. But imagine our surprise to hear clapping and calls for more in good English from the German trenches. Thereupon the Welshmen gave 'Mintra Gwen.'

"Meantime we realised that not a shot had been fired by either side during the song. We had forgotten all about war. So a bargain was struck with the Germans that if the Welshman would give us another song neither side would fire any more until daylight.

"The third song was 'Hen Wlad Fy Nhadau.' It was perhaps the first time the Welsh national anthem was ever heard on this dismal Flemish morass."

Military Millinery Hit.

A special dispatch received by the Berlin Tageblatt from Brussels says the latest craze in millinery, Belgian soldiers' caps, has attained such great popularity there that the German authorities have had to confiscate the new style of headgear from hundreds of women and to forbid the further use of such caps.

The soldiers' wives and sweethearts had discarded the flags and other national color adornments and adopted the caps of cavalrymen and carbineers, which they tilted at a rakish angle. The fad threatened to create a public nuisance, as the wearing of the caps by the women caused outbursts of patriotic enthusiasm at every turn. The women took the confiscation good naturedly, the milliners being the only ones to grieve.

A Sea Holdup.

"The captain of the Dutch steamer Helena has described to me how his ship was held up forty miles from Haaks lightship in the North sea by a German airship which descended near the sea and hoisted signals ordering the steamer to heave to," writes a correspondent. "The Helena was overhauled by the Zeppelin L-5 at 10 o'clock Tuesday morning. It was clear and in the sunshine the airship was seen at a great altitude approaching swiftly from the direction of the coast and rocking like a ship in a rough sea.

"It flew directly over the Helena, whose crew distinctly saw fifteen or twenty persons in three cars which were connected by a covered gangway. The men wore dark, close fitting tunics, caps like hoods and goggles.

"They watched the Helena through glasses in a kind of turret in the forepart of the airship. The crews of a quick-firing gun were at their stations, and the great naval ensign flew at the stern of the gas bag. The airship circled the Helena twice, then appeared to be satisfied and, after exchanging signals, returned in the direction of the coast.

Great Rifles Tested at Indian Head Weigh 100 Tons.

The two battleships provided for in the current naval bill may be armed with sixteen inch rifles, the heaviest naval guns ever designed.

While tentative plans for the new ships contemplate vessels similar in general design to the 32,000 ton giants of the California class now building, details of armament and engine equipment are being given unusual attention by navy designers and the results obtained from the fifteen inch main batteries of the newest British and German battleships are being closely watched.

Already the new sixteen inch navy gun has been subjected to tests at the Indian Head proving grounds, and while details of its construction and performance are closely guarded, it is known that the gigantic weapon has given proof of its efficiency. The gun was built at the American naval gun factory.

Some idea of the probable size of the new American gun may be gathered from the fact that each of the eight fifteen-inch guns of the British battleship Queen Elizabeth weighs ninety-six tons, while similar rifles designed in the Krupp works for German battleships laid down this year each weigh more than eighty-two tons. The fourteen inch rifles of the battleships New York and Texas and for the five new American Dreadnoughts now under construction weigh 68.3 tons each, and it is certain that the new sixteen inch weapon weighs more than a hundred tons without its mounting.

Krupp engineers have designed a sixteen inch gun which fires a projectile weighing 2,028 pounds, against the 1,675 pound mass of steel hurled by the fifteen inch rifles adopted for the German navy and the 1,720 pound projectiles poured into the Turkish fortresses of the Dardanelles by the British battleship Queen Elizabeth.

United States navy officers say the American fourteen inch gun is equal of the British or German fifteen inch for all practical purposes. With any target in plain view, it is said, the American gun has equal range and nearly equal penetration, the difference being more than counterbalanced by the larger number of guns carried.

of 328 public dance halls in Chicago are a revelation of the grossly immoral conditions we allow to exist in what we are pleased to call our Christian cities, complacently indifferent because we think our children are safe.

As one of the best agencies to improve the conditions she describes, Mrs. Bowen makes a strong plea for policewomen. Among other things, she says:

"Women police are not needed to handle crowds, to regulate street traffic, to arrest drunkards and criminals; but they are sorely needed in order that they may adequately protect the thousands of children and young people who everyday are exposed to the dangers of unsupervised and disreputable places of amusement, and for whose safety and welfare the city is responsible."

Mrs. Bowen's figures as to the percentage of delinquents found among children who have engaged in street trades prove conclusively that the city which fails to properly regulate street trading is guilty of serious and costly neglect. As a result of the work of the Juvenile Protective Association, Chicago now has an ordinance which provides "That no boy under 14 years of age shall sell upon the streets after 8 o'clock in the evening or before 5 o'clock in the morning, and that no girl under 18 years of age shall sell anything at any time upon the streets."

Here is a result of poor planting and the wrong kind of fertilizer:

"Nearly 90 per cent. of the boys in the county jail come from the congested districts of the city, where the neighborhood conditions are very bad and the boys are surrounded on every side by evil influences. The home is bad, saloons line the streets, and at the back doors are the railroad tracks and dumping grounds."

Well might some of our older and more congested cities exclaim, "Oh, to be young again, and able to plan ahead, so as to escape some of these evils which now are so difficult to remove!" Will the younger cities heed the lesson?

No such opportunity for assisting the growth of a healthy, happy, efficient citizenship is open to any other branch of a city's government as that within the proper scope of its public system. But our citizen-growers have never seized the whole of this opportunity. Various scattered attempts have been seized the whole of this opportunity. Various scattered attempts have been made in some of our schools to instill the ethics of good citizenship into their pupils; but no consistent course in this most important subject, beginning with the lowest grade and continuing through the highest, has yet been established as a regular part of the school curriculum. And why not? Why does it take so long to do the obviously logical thing?

After summarizing some of its many practical suggestions, ex-President Taft, who writes the introduction to "A Course in Citizenship," says:

"I am glad to observe, too, that in a number of the chapters there is brought home to the child the necessity for siding with, sympathizing with, and actively aiding officials charged with the execution of the law."

City officials might be glad, too, if this lesson were brought home to a number of children of larger growth.

The chapter heading of this valuable book convey a pretty fair idea of its plan and scope and how it relates its ethical teachings to actual every-day life. They are divided according to grades, as follows:

Grade I—Home
Grade II—School and Playground
Grade III—The Neighborhood
Grade IV—Town and City
Grade V—The Nation
Grade VI—American Ideals
Grade VII—The United States and the World
GradeVIII—The World Family.

There is nothing dry or formal in the method of treating these subjects in the different chapters; bright stories, poetry, anecdotes are used, but, above all, the method aims to get the child to think out his own relation to the subject under discussion.

As a city official or vice worker, why not visit your school, look over the curriculum, and see how far the pupils are being taught to co-operate with you in maintaining the health, cleanliness and order of their city? Ten to one, you'll find the course in citizenship consists in telling them when the legislature meets, how many members in the upper and lower house, the salary of the governor, and other soul-stirring facts like these!

As someone has somewhere said, the most uncommon thing is common sense.

ALBANY LETTER DAY BY DAY

By FREDERIC T. CARDOZE

Albany, April 3.—Senator George F. Thompson of Niagara county, believes that there should be no more than ten State departments and that a consolidation of the fifty or sixty bureaus now existing, each with separate heads, should be reduced to that number. If possible, he says, the elected State officials should have jurisdiction over them.

"This latter course, however, probably could not be brought about because of the growth of the State. For instance, it would be very hard to find a proper elective official in whose department the department of health could be transferred. This properly belongs with the agricultural department and some others in a department of Internal Affairs of the State, which should be created," says Senator Thompson.

"But even under the present Constitution it is my opinion that the great work of proper systematizing of the State departments could be formed by this Legislature without any Constitutional changes and a reduction could be made of the number of departments to probably between ten and fteen. For instance, the highway department should not be maintained as a separate department. It should be a bureau of the department of public works. If the superintendent of public works can be entrusted to build canals, he certainly should be abel to build hiyhways as well as look after the public buildings of the State and the State parks and reservations. The highway department too should not bep ermitted to employ attorneys or engineers. The attorneys and counsel should be employed by the attorney general and engineers of the State engineer and surveyor, so that if the highway department, for instance, desire the services of counsel application should be made to the attorney general, who would no doubt assign a deputy in case the extent of the service required it and if he desired the survey of a highway and application to the State engineer and surveyor should be made. Following the survey and after the letting of the contracts by the bureau chief in charge of highways, he could again apply to the State engineer and surveyor to furnish the inspectors to guarantee that the work should be done by the contractor in accordance with the previous plans."

Senator Thompson thinks also that the department of the State architect should be consolidated as a bureau of the State engineer and surfeyor, thus doing away with some fifteen or twenty sets of blue printing machinery now owned by the State, all of which could be performed in one office and all files would be in one place. "Of course," admits Senator Thompson, "I realize that a State architect could not be an engineer, but the State engineer and surveyor could be entrusted to employ a competent man to take charge of the bureau of architecture."

In his interview, Senator Thompson son says that his above ideas only briefly convey his plan for a proper systemitizing of all the State departments. He takes the highway department as an instance to outline his theory. "I regard the State highway department bureau chief in the same light as I would a man who desires to build a house. He is perfectly competent to build a house, although he might not be competent to draw the deed to the land, nor draw the plans and specification for the house. He would get a lawyer so that he would be sure that the deed was properly drawn; he would then get an architect to prepare his plans. Next, he would select his own plans and let his won contract, finally turning to the architect for the benefit of his expert ability of inspection. This is the natural course of commercial organizations."

If the consolidation system in which he believes were to be carried out, Senator Thompson says that a great saving would result.

MERCHANT PLEADS FOR HONEST ADS.

Needs Leader to Point Out Path of Truth in Trade, Says Mr. Diamond.

New York, April 2.—A leader to put them on the path of truthful advertising would be welcomed by tens of thousands of merchants in the United States, in the opinion of M. Maurice Diamond, president of the A. D. Matthews store, Brooklyn. He was the principal speaker at the weekly luncheon of the Full Copy Club at the Hotel Vanderbilt yesterday.

"I for one welcome Samuel Hopkins Adams," he said, "who by his wonderful courage gives us the strength of our convictions to continue the work that we have started to do.

"The world loves a square deal, but it patronizes a square dealer. The saying that you can't do wrong and get away with it was never more truthfully exemplified than in advertising. The time will come when newspapers will reserve the privileges of refusing all advertisements which they do not believe to be absolutely true, and the sooner it comes the better.

"A newspaper should be against lending a moral support to help a faker sell his merchandise, and it should refuse to sell its tremendous influence for illegitimate purposes.

"Truthful advertising points to the coming of a new era in advertising or, rather a resumption of the old era. It ought not to be said that to speak the truth is an original thing, and it must not be thought that I mean we are dishonest today by intention, but through custom. It takes a loan of courage to state more than the general public thinks, to come out and say what is the truth, in order to sell his goods, and not say those things that the public expects him to say through long years of custom."

BEST THOUGHTS FOR EASTER

Meant for Those Who Have a Real Appreciation of the Significance of the Season

On Easter Sunday let us think—Of him in honor of whose perfect life and glorious resurrection carols ascend and flowers breathe forth their beauty and fragrance.

Of the God who sent him to confirm the hopes of the human race in the reality of the life beyond death.

Of the risen Christ's continued manifestation of himself through the pardon of peace, the comfort and the power which he bestows upon his disciples.

Of the Divine reserves yet to be released to complete, with man's assistance the work Christ began.

Of beloved friends gone into the unseen world, still near us, still loving and needing us, but rejoicing in the richer, fuller life of the realm into which they have entered.

Of those hovering between life and death, and those who watch anxiously by their bedsides.

Of all who will spend Easter Sunday in prisons and hospitals, and the great army of those shut away, by age and infirmity, from the world's busy life.

Of victims of recent disasters on land and sea, and of all in any way affected by such calamities.

Of human need and loneliness in any part of the world which we can alleviate.

Of the joy and hope in millions of hearts today because of the Christ who died and rose again.

A sewing class of some fifty girls met every week, and its members sewed and worked for a bazaar which was held in December. The boys added their efforts to make the affair a success, and had a large part in the evening's entertainment following. This was done to raise money for a gymnasium, sorely needed when the winter weather is upon us.

Has it Paid?

The summer work has been so successful in its popularity with the children that many more children are applying for gardens adjoining ground is to be plowed for them.

We who have worked with the children feel that our efforts have not been wasted. The children have been happier for the existence of their garden city, and through it they are finding the value of healthy outdoor life; the attractions of crowded cities will appeal to them less now that they have found in their own countryside the outlet for youthful spirits under proper supervision. We hope in this way to keep our young men and women with us more than formerly, since we have been brought to realize that it is often the lack of interesting conditions which drives them away.

This work has been an inspiration not only to the children, but to the older people of the community, who now realize that the children are an asset and that anything done for their good is an investment that will pay large dividends. It is believed that many of the children have been benefited along other lines than physical, and this year we hope for greater results.

Seneca River Power Co. Suit Tried Today In Supreme Court

Judge Hubbs Hears Argument of Remonstrants Against Granting City Lighting Contract

The suit brought by the Seneca River Power Company for a permanent injunction against John W. Stevenson et al., members of the Fulton Board of Public Works, and the Fulton Light, Heat and Power Company, went on trial this morning in Oswego. Up to the hour of going to press this afternoon, the case had not yet been disposed of. The plaintiff's attorney, Eugene M. White, of Phoenix, rested his case shortly after noon today and the defense began. The attorney for the defendants is Charles Spencer, of Gannon, Spencer and Mitchell, of Syracuse.

The Niagara people are bringing suit for the injunction on the grounds that the Fulton Board of Public Works let a contract to the Fulton Light, Heat and Power Company, the specifications of which were not in accordance with the specifications which were attached in the invitations to bidders. The Fulton company tendered a figure on one set of specifications and the Niagara company it is claimed on another and the Fulton company was awarded the contract.

The witnesses called by the plaintiff were Leon R. Scudder, George M. Fanning and William Moon, of the Niagara company.

When the defense opened its side of the case this afternoon the first witness called was F. G. Spencer. The witnesses during the morning session described the form of invitations and the specifications which had been sent out to the bidders.

35 MEN SENT TO BOTTOM OF DANUBE

Nish, April 5.—An Austrian screw steamer, carrying 600 tons of ammunition and artillery material, struck a mine laid in the Danube for Serbian defense purposes on the night of March 30. The after part of the steamer was damaged. The Serbian artillery fired on the steamer, causing an explosion and the vessel sank soon after.

Although the xeplosion occurred several miles from Belgrade, all the buildings in the city were shaken as if by an earthquake.

Two only of the crew of the vessel were saved.

The Austrian battries at Semlin retorted by firing several immense shells into Belgrade, doing much damage to the town, but no lives were lost.

Paris, April 4.—Thirty-five members of the crew were drowned by the dstruction of the Austrian steamer which blew up in the Danube on March 30, according to a dispatch to the Haxas Agency, which intimates thatthe munitions she carried were for Turkey.

Before leaving Semlin the Captain is reported to have remin[illegible] them embers of his crew that they had an important mission to fulfil[illegible] another received a bonus of 100 francs ($20) in gold.

AUSTRIANS LOSE DUKLA AND LUPKOW; BEATEN IN VIOLENT BATTLES

SAYS NEW SHELLS SLAY ALL FOES IN TRENCHES

London, April 5.—In an interview at Tokio, Count Okuma, the Japanese Premier, is at paints to tell what Japan is not requiring of China, but is silent as to the nature of the actual demands. To this attitude The Daily News takes exception in an editorial, asserting that until such a revelation is made uneasiness in this country will continue.

Count Okuma assertsthat German intrigue has been employed to spread broadcast an exaggerated idea of what Japan is demanding of China. He declares that "Japan is asking only what China has already granted Germany," and asserts that "Japan's proposals are in compelte accordance with the Anglo-Japanese alliance, as well as treaties with other countries guaranteeing equal opportunity in China and the integrity of that country.

Japan, says the Premier, seeks no monopoly in China, does not aim to infringe the rights or interests of other powers, has not demanded the appointment of Japanese advisers, does not seek to create a protectorate, and has hot demanded a joint policy except at points in South Manchuria threatened by lawlessness.

Taking these negative assertions as a text, The Daily News says:

"The only comment possible on this declaration is, Why are these final disclosures delayed? What object can the Japanese Government have in submitting quietly to a campaign of calumny when the demands from which this campaign springs are thus wholly reasonabel and moderate? If it is possible to tsate thus categorically what these demands do not contain, why should it be impossible to inform the world as to what they do contain?

"Every one, in this country at least, is willing and even anxious to put the best possible interpretation on Japan's activities. If it could be shown, as to judge from Count Okuma's statement, it only requires the publication of the real terms of the proposed treaty to show that Japan's aims in these negotiations have been totally misrepresented, the news would undoubtedly be very warmly welcomed in England, but so long as the proposals themselves remain screened behind a veil of official secrecy it is quite impossible to allay the uneasiness thath as been aroused. It is difficult to imagine any solid compensating advantage which Japan can hope to gain from persistence in a silence which is undoubtedly doing her injury."

ENGLAND WANTS JAPAN TO BECOME FRANK

Paris, April 5.—Ever since the beginning of the war there have been rumors of a new French explosive of appalling power of destructiveness. A recent official statement referred to the expected increase of results from artillery fire consequnce upon some discoveries, and today the Eclair priuts an extract from a soldier's letter, which says:

"We had three trenches to take and expected a hard job. The preliminary cannonade was terrific. The air itself seemed on fire. Then the signal was given and we charged, but the usual hail of bullets was lacking.

"On reaching the first trench we halted, petrified. It was filled with corpses, and not even the wounded were living. In a corner the soldier who served the mitrailleuse was upright, chained to the gun. He, too, was lifeless.

"We rushed a second trench, and then the third. The same silence is there; every one is annihilated."

Russians Take Two Thousand Prisoners; Austrians Continue to Lose Ground in Mountain Passes

Vienna, April 5. (via London.)—Retreat of the Austrian forces in the Bskid region of the Carpathians, where some of the heaviest fighting ahs taken place in the struggle for control of the mountain passes leading into Hungary, was announced at Army Headquarters. the statement is as follows:

"The presence of fare Russian reinforcements, arriving from Przsmysl, compelled the Austrian Army to withdraw from the Beskid region.

"In the Carpathians fighting on both sides of the Laborcza valley continues. Yesterday we attacked the eastern heights and dislodged the enemy from several strong positions. Russian attacks east of Virawa were repulsed.

"In yesterday's engagements we captured 2,020 prisoners.

"North of Uzok Pass the situation is unchanged. Renewed Russian attacks miscarried, after a short fight.

"There's is now news from the other fronts."

London, April 5.—The official Petrograd report on the operatoins in the Beskids claims "a great success." It says:

"In the Carpathians on Friday we gained a great success in the sector north of the roads leading to Bartfeld and also in the region between Mezo Laborcz and Lutowiska.

"During that day we captured on the Carpathian front more than 2,000 soldiers and three guns and three machine guns.

"In the Zaleszitrow region the Austrians essayed an offensive, but all their attacks failed completely. We captured two officers and about 100 men.

"In the direction of Chotin, (Bessarabia,) after the grave defeat inflicted on them March 30 by portions of our cavalry, who delivered an irresistible attack while on foot, the Austrians evacuated our territory and withdrew to their frontier, where they are fortifying themselves.

TURKS MASSED TO ATTACK DARDANELLES

Athens, April 5.—I have just returned here from a stay in the Dardanelles region, and may brieffy sum up the present position there. Since the battle on March 18 there has been on activity, with the exception of that reported last Sunday, and the work of mine sweeping.

A close watch, however, is being kept on the further coast of the Gallipoli Peninsula and on the Hellespont up to the narrows, and I believe I am correct in saying that Sunday's bombardment was to prevent the enemy repairing any of the damage already done by the allied fleets.

There can be no question of the results already achieved being rendered nugatory by delay. I have heard on good authority that the destruction wrought was so very severe that it is practically impossible for the Turks to repair effectively any of the forts and works already destroyed. The heavy guns of the fleet have reduced them to a condition of chaos. When the attack is resumed it is believed that the Turks will feel the severity of the loss.

First Quarter Failures

According to Dun's Review, there were 7,216 failures in the Uited States during the first quarter of 1915, with liabilities amounting to $105,703,335. In umber of defaults this record is greater than in any previous year, but it is significant of the recent progressive improvement in business that there were 758 fewer suspensions in March, and less than half the liabilities, than during January. The three month's record, therefore, largely represents the commercial and industrial unsettlement produced by the European war, from which depression a period of recovery has now set in.Inasmuch as the effect of the war was felt most severly in the South, where cotton exports were temporarily suspended, but have since been resumed in large volume, and in the Middle Atlantic States, resulting in a large reduction of industrial activity, the increase in number of insolvencies was particularly heavy. The toals for the quarter will probably long remain a high record for the period. The aggregate liabilities of $105,703,335 has been only once exceeded, namely, by the $121,-500,000 involved in the second quarter of the panic year 1893. In 1914 there were 4,826 sus pensions, owing $83,221,826.

The largest number of defaults during the past quarter were in the trading class, being 5,348, for $48,712,319 liabilities, comparing with 3,489 in 1914 with liabilities of $36,500,570. Manufacturing failures numbered 1,580 for $46,211,855, comparing with 1,147 in 1914 with liabilities of $34,-644,880. The defaults in the class of agents and brokers were more numerous than in the corresponding quarter of 1914, but the liabilities were $1,-297,035 less.

The quarter's exhibit is of much interest as a statistical test of the ecect of the European war upon the business of this neutral Nation, and the improvement from month to month reveals the intrinsic strength of the country, the liabilities for March, 1915, being only 22 per cent. of the total for the quarter, whilet hose for March, 1914, were 25 per cent.

In New York State during the quarter liabilities decreased from $21,-633,812 to $19,729,568, in spite of the fact that there were 1,193 suspensions, against only 792 in the previous year.—Utica Dispatch.

Where Your Taxes Go

The election last fall cost $4,079,171 and of the amount $2,824,000 was paid by the public. The rest was expended by the candidates for election.

Although the State spends thousands of dollars to tabulate the number of times an inspector of election failed to write the full name, instead of just the initials of a voter, it has no system of collecting election expense statistics. The result is that the next constitutional convention would have to work in the dark on any reform in this respect, but for the fact that the New York Times has spent two months of solid work collecting this information.

State Controller Travis in his report recently pointed out that thousands of dollars are wasted annually to compile unnecessary figures about insignificant mistakes made by inspectors of election. The reason that these figures are compiled is that it furnishes a degree of employment to the board of election in every county. But it is well known to those familiar with the work of boards of election that even this useless work is not sufficient to give the employes under the commissioners enough to do the year round. As for the commissioners themselves, their job is merely "supervision" and assumption of "responsibility" at as large a salary as they can persuade a board of supervisors to give them. The pay of the chief clerks, clerks, stenographers, bookkeepers, etc., is determined by the commissioners themselves, quite unrestrained by any Legislature or other appropriating body. Naturally the boards of election figures large in the cost of elections. The salaries run right along through the year although the full duties there [illegible] three or four months around election time.

There are 175 regular deputy superintendents, paid at the rate of $900 to $1,500 annually eachand 400 special deputies at $200 each during the busy season, nominally to see that the election is run honestly and properly but really just to draw their pay and work for the party by which they were appointed. The cost of these useess officials is $350,000 per year—which could be used for something genuinely valuable to the State.

The fact that the deputies and the other election officials do not do their duty is shown by the high percentage of candidates who do not file their statements of election expenses. In Allegany county none of thhe candidates filed a statement. Still this county had its board of election and its quota of deputies at Eldorado and [illegible] of so much importance. It was presumably their own money and it did not come out of the public, directly, at least, in taxes. Still the expenditures is largely a speculation. Many men who put up money in this way hope to get it back. If they get it back, they get it out of the public and it is wellknown that they don't always give full service for the money received.—Utica Press.

THE ADMINISTRATION

The man who tells one that by securing added industries and a desired growth of population this city might run the risk of labor disturbances, is not a whit more progressive than the man who boasts of the small amount of money he gives his wife for the home. While it is true that the large centers of population are the greatest sufferers from disturbances in the labor world, there are notworthy exceptions such as for instance, Detroit, where because of the prevailing happiness of the people strikes are almost unknown.

In Detroit labor is well paid, but that is not all. There the workers are given the thought that should be theirs. Amusements are provided for them and there are plenty of places of recreation—halthy indoor and outdoor places. Detroit is not in its swaddling clothes. It never barred industry for fear of what might or might not come. Its chief aim was to first make the city attractive to the people that they would acquire taste for the beautiful in life, in all of their surroundings.

And Detroit has prospered.

And the people of Detroit are prosperous.

Detroit's streets are clean, its parks are clean, and all because its people are encouraged along the line of civic pride.

And the assessed valuation is lower than in Fulton.

And yet in Detroit there is plenty of money for improvements—the kind that make the people happy and comfortable; the kind that encourage the people to look for the good things in life.

Detroit's streets are clean because plenty of water is provided for keeping them clean; and, there being water in abundance it is used to encourage cleanliness and godliness.

Low tax rates are desirable, but they are not the essentialities toward adding new industries. A city cannot hope to buy $100 worth of improvements for $50. That is out of the question, just as much so as it would be for a housewife to buy $50 worth of household comfort for $25. If we cheapen the city we must do without the necessary improvements; if the housewife is deprived of a sum of money that will provide a decent living and a few luxuries there must ensue a lowering of the standard all around.

No one disputes the staatement that Fulton's tax rate is high. It is true that big things have been done with the people's money, and it is true that big things have been unwisely done. No one begrudes money spent for improvements that the public in general receives a dollor's worth for a dollar, but the average taxpayer does pull a little tighter the flap of his pocketbook when he is assessed for improvements that are of a specific nature—improvements that benefit one or two persons at the expense of the entire city.

And this is the history of the present city administration.

ELECT THE JUDGES

The Bar Association of the State of New York is a powerful organization. The legal profession composes a decided majority of the Legislature and if there was anything it wanted in the way of reform, it could have it. Still we recall that men eminent in the profession have deplored the condition of our criminal and civil procedure. Why do these lawyers tolerate such conditions? Why are "costs" in these days of the typewriter, rapid printing and other improvements assessed at the same high rate that prevailed formerly?

The fact is that the profession is strong on precedent. Precedent composes a large part of most arguments. Precedent has been one of the greatest barriers to human and advanced legislation. The people have not only had to fight their battles through the Legislature, but when won there they have often had to fight another and a longer fight to get past the courts and court-made laws. This condition brought forth such proposals as recall of judges and recall of judicial decisions.

All of this is pertinent to the proposal that judges shall be appointed by judges. Should the constitutional convention provide that change, the courts will be further removed from the control of the people and even less responsive to their deliberate judgment. In fact, that is one of the reasons some lawyers advocate the appointment of judges, only they call the people "the mob."

Just at present, however, the complaint of that section of the legal profession which advocates the appointment of judges is having much to say about the quality of the judges. Whatever may be the quality below the Harlem, there is not much that can be said against the Supreme Court justices up-State. Whenever it happens that an up-State judge shows he is not fit for his place, he is straightway defeated at the first opportunity the people get at him.

The people do not want to lose whatever hold they have on the courts. If anything, their sentiment is for a quicker and more ready responsiveness to their desires on the part of the courts. They do not fancy the idea of seeing the courts set further up and away from them. They do not want a chief justice of a court of appeals appointing judges so that they may decide questions according to his ideas. The peoplew ant judges who will decide cases according to their ideas—which are often far in advance of those of the sticklers for precedent.—Utica Observer.

A Valued Pocket Piece

By JOHN Y. LARNED

My father was killed fighting on the northern side in the battle of Gettysburg, on the 2d of July. I was old enough to remember the news of his death and the military funeral that was given him when his body was sent home. Thirty years after his death I was paid a silver dollar bearing date of 1863. Since it marked the date of my father's death in battle, I prized it, and, instead of parting with it, I cut on it my father's initials.

One day while traveling I fell in with a young man, with whom I chatted. On entering the station at Cleveland the car door was thrown open and a trainman called: "Cleveland! All out!"

The young man, surprised that the train would go no farther, made inquiries and discovered that he must stop overnight in Cleveland. He at once began to examine the contents of his pocketbook and found that he had barely enough to pay his bill at a hotel. I asked him to permit me to lend him some funds, but he refused, saying that he had just sufficient to get through. I insisted on his taking more, and he said if I had any loose change in my pocket he would accept it as a loan. The only coin I had was my pocket piece. After a moment's hesitation I handed it to him. He tried to get my address in order to return the loan, but we were leaving the train in a crowd, and I hurried away.

Not long after this the newspapers were filled with accounts of the murder of Richard Thornton, a wealthy man, in Buffalo. The case was one of those mysterious happenings that attract widespread attention. A nephew of the deceased, Edgar Thornton, was accused of murdering his uncle in order to secure his estate. The murdered man was very old, a bachelor, and his household affairs were administered by a Mrs. Ferguson, a widow, who, the evidence seemed to indicate, was endeavoring to induce him to make a will in her favor. The state attorney, by patching together bits of evidence, made a very good case, showing that the nephew, in whose favor a will had already been made, fearing that the woman would succeed in securing one giving her the property, had murdered his uncle to prevent his doing so.

Mrs. Ferguson swore that Edgar Thornton was with his uncle on the night of the murder, the two being together in the uncle's bedroom. She claimed to have heard high words between them. Edgar had left the house at 11 o'clock. She did not see Richard Thornton till the next morning, when she found him dead, with a pillow pulled over his face. A weak point in the prosecution was that some $200 that the deceased had on hand in a desk was missing. The state attorney declared that the accused had taken the money in order to make it appear that the murder had been committed for the purpose of robbery.

I read the newspaper reports of the trial, missing only one day's report. The next issue of the paper mentioned that the accused had endeavored to prove an alibi.

The servants in the house were all against Mrs. Ferguson, testifying that she kept Mr. Thornton in a sort of imprisonment, but they were persons of no education, and their evidence was easily pulled to pieces by the prosecutor. Indeed, Mrs. Ferguson proved that they had been liberally tipped by Edgar Thornton whenever he had called on his uncle.

It did not take me long to make up my mind that the accused was guilty. He could not have been innocent unless Mrs. Ferguson had perjured herself in testifying that he was with his uncle, and the only person with him on the night of the murder.

I read the summing up of the case by the prosecutor, and my attention was attracted to these words:

The prisoner has claimed that on the night the murder was committed he was traveling on a train between Cleveland and Buffalo.

My meeting with the man to whom I had loaned a silver dollar flashed upon me. Could this Edgar Thornton be the person I had met? That person was to remain over in Cleveland at a hotel. The accused claimed to have been on a train.

A human life might depend on my action. I took a train for Buffalo and when I arrived went to the courtroom where the trial was being held. In the prisoner I recognized my fellow traveler. I called for his attorney, told my story and was put on the stand. I testified that on a certain date—the evening of the murder—I had entered Cleveland with the accused and had loaned him a silver dollar, which I described. The prisoner produced the identical dollar I had given him with the initials and date I had scratched on it.

There was a sensation in the courtroom. A man who was about to be convicted of murder was acquitted and was heir to a fortune. When I asked how he happened to have been on a train instead of in a hotel in Buffalo he said he had found passage on a combination milk and passenger train. Mrs. Ferguson had perjured herself to be revenged on the man to whom she had lost her fortune.

At the rate the Democratic state administration for four years created places for favorites another term under scuh rule would have left few members of the party without positions on the public pay roll. Small wonder that the Democracy is bending every effort to hide the facts until they can be shifted to the account of the Republicans.—Troy Record.

Chairman Tanner of the Republican State committee does not favor the Argetsinger bill for ending direct primaries and going back to the old system before the new one has been given a thorough trial.

It would be a serious mistake for the party now in control of the Legislature to allow the people to get the conviction that it is reactionary and is bent upon undoing all recent progressive legislation. And it now looks as though the leaders are willing to abandon some proposed measures for the sake of what they know is the sentiment of the progressive and independent voters of the State.—Binghamton Press.

The ability of a Democratic congress to "get away" with the people's money appears to grow in inverse ratio to the length of the sitting. The total appropriations voted at the last or "short" session of the Sixty-third congress were $1,128,080,000 or $12,000,000.more than the aggregate for the "long" session of a year ago. And that does not seem to be the whole story. Some appropriations went over because of lack of agreement on certain items, and the government's needs were provided for temporarily on certain items, and the government's needs were provided for temporarily by the expdient of extending the appropriations granted for a preceding fiscal year. The total for the two years of the Democratic Sixty-third congress was $2,244,000,000.—Cortland Standard.

The Democratic party is accutomed to sneer at the full dinner pail slogan of happier times, but we submit that a full dinner pail in wicked Republican good times is preferable to an empty stomach in these virtuous Democratic times when a considerable portion of the populace is watchfully waiting along the bread line or at free soup stations for "handouts."—Newburgh Journal.

MUSIC TO SOOTHE THE OUTLAW

A favorite theory of ethics would make the basis for human conduct a universal desire to harmonize one's self with one's environmetn and the universe. Both the good and the wicked have this desire, it is declared, but the wicked lack the instinct to gratify it. Criminologists contend that the wicked suffer from nervous defects which interfere with their sense of rhythm, and therefore dull or destroy the natural feeling for the harmonious in conduct and surroundings.

All of this may have some bearing on the assertion of Pittsburgh's Superintendent of Police that music will "convert the crook." Music is simply an interpretation of life expressed in harmonies which even our Mike the Bites and Gyp the Bloods can feel with their defective strung and poorly attuned nervous systems. Indeed, there is some reason for believing that their natures are starving for some aid of this sort to a proper subconscious appreciation of their relation to society. There is, from this point of view, as much pathos as humor in the report from the city of smoke that recently when the police quartet in Central Station sang "Where Is My Wandering Boy Tonight?" three pickpockets wept in their cells. Even such simple fare they receive with emotional gratitude.

But not all simple fare, whether of food or music, is properly nourishing. Cheap, sentimental tunes induce in the savage breast a pity of self which has no permanent curative value. If Superintendent Matthews would put his belief in the reformatory power of music to a thorough test he should first learn to discriminate between the wholesome and the unwholesome in his medium, or make way for a more learned dietist.—N. Y. Tribune.

THE CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION

(International News Service)

Albany, N. Y., April 5.—New York's new constitution will be written by Republicans. This was assured long before the delegates began gathering here today for the convention which opens tomorrow. The party whose leading spirits include Seth Low, Elihu Root and William Barnes, Jr., controls 116 of the 168 votes. It is reported Mr. Root will be chosen chairman.

The convention is made up of fifteen delegates-at-large and three district delegates from each of the fifty-one Senate districts. The Republicans elected all the fifteen delegates-at-large, who are generally men of more prominence and influnc than the district delegates.

Of the fifty-two Democratic district delegates all are from New York city with the exception of six. Three of these are from the Second District, on Long Island, and three from Buffalo.

In only one district, the Eighteenth of New York, are the delegates of different parties. Mark Eisner, a Democrat, represents the districts, with two Republicans as colleagues.

In its 1914 platform the Republican party declared the new constitution should embrace "only matters involving essential and permanent political principles and constitutional limitations." Matters of detail "should be left to treatment by the Legislature in statute law," thus attempting to prevent conflicts between the Legislature and the courts.

HOME RULE

Perhaps the most important question before the convention is home rule for local municipalities. The Municipal Government Association proposes granting the power to cities to draft, adopt, and amend their own charters and would limit the power of the legislature to enact special laws affecting individual cities.

It would give the municipalities full power in local affairs, abolish the present classification of cities and leave the State only the power to legislate in matters of State concern.

The latest Republican State platform declared for continuing the constitutional limitation upon the debts of cities and the control over taxation, but pronounced for "home rule to the widest practicable extent."

The Democratic State platform said: "Home rule, to its fullest extent, should be conferred upon our cities, freed from the interference by the legislature and greater powers of local legislation granted to bards of supervisors."

SHORT BALLOT

While the Democrats are lukewarm toward lessening the number of elective state officials, the Republicans have pronounced strongly for the change.

ADMINISTRATIVE FUNCTIONS

The Republicans come out for the limitation of the number of State departments, to prevent useless duplication; while the Democratic State platform declares: "The responsibility should be centered in the governor. The various boards and commissions should be made subject to the control of the governor."

JUDICIARY

Almost every public body and man of standing in the State agrees that the courts need reform. There are, however, many diverse opinions concerning hte new form the judicial system should take. This be one of the storm points of the convention.

The Republican platform promises "thorough reform." "Legislation in regard to judicial procedure should be confined to a short and simple Practice Act," it says, "and the power to devise, amend, or abrogate rules of procedure should be delegated to the courts to be adopted or modified by them from time to time as experience dictats, controlled only by fundamental laws."

LEGISLATION

Among the interesting proposals regarding the State Legislature are (1) that the governor and chief administrative offiecrs have seats in the chamber, without voting privlege, like the British system; in the chamber, without voting privilege, like the British system; general legislation; (3) that there be only biennial sessions, except in cases of emergency; and (4) that private claim bills be prohibited.

APPORTIONMENT

Many delegates will make a fight to abolish the practice of "gerrymanderings" or re-districting the State for partisan purposes.

INITIATIVE, REFERENDUM AND RECALL

There is little expectation that any of the these three new governmental institutions will be incorporated in the new constitution.

BUDGET

It is hoped and expected that a scientific budget system will be one of the most marked reforms of the convention. There will probably be little opposition to this feature.

FRANCHISES

As a result of the convention the iniquitous custom of granting franchises in perpetuity to use public property will almost certainly be ended. The new constitution is expected to declare that every franchise must be granted as a lease for a fixed period.

SAFEGUARDING OF ELECTIONS

Many public organizations demand non-partisan election officials to take the place of the present bi-partisan inspectors of election, poll and ballot clerks. It is held this would prevent the present corruption in elections.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE

The woman suffrage question is to be submitted to the voters of the State this fall. The convention will make arrangements to have its work harmonize with this election and its results.

CIVIL SERVICE

New [illegible]te long has had good service law but the enforcement has [illegible] very lax. It is hard to see how the convention could improve matters.

WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION

The power of the Legislature to safeguard the health and lives of the people will probably be better defined and recognized in the new constitution.

CANALS

The administration of the canal projects of the State has led to scandal. It is hoped the convention will clear up the complications of the present situation.

COUNTY GOVERNMENTS

Many public men believe that the counties are too numerous, that many of their officials are superfluous, and that the present county system leads to useless duplication of muncipal and State functions.

TREASURY DEPT. FORCES DEFICIT

House Will Correct Unsystematic Method of Spending Money

Washington, April2. — Confronted with increasing appropriations and an unsystematic method of distributing Uncle Sam's expense money, legislators at the next session of Congress will take up the big question of creating a budget committee in the House of Representatives to handle all the appropriation bills.

The sixty-thrd Congress appropriated, in round figures, $2,231,000,000 and it was a record breaker for spending money. Chairman Fitzgerald of the Appropriations Committee, says in a statement analyzing the appropriations for the final session of the sixty-third Congress that there can be no systematic retrenchment in expenditures so long as the appropriation bills are divided up among half a dozen committees.

Representative Fitzgerald asserts that one of the really big tasks before the next Congress is the consideration of a budget system, a consolidation of appropriating power in one committee and a prohibition against new legislation in appropriation bills.

Although a Democrat, Mr. Fitzgerald frankly says that the appropriations of the sixty-fourth Congress, in conjunction with the falling off of im ports and the duties there from leaves the Treasury in a bad way [illegible] there will be a deficit of more than $100,000,000 by the end of the fiscal year.

Eight committees of the House, whereis appropriation bills originate, now have appropriating powers, although the so-called Appropriation Committee handles several of the more important bills. These eight committees mean divided authority and responsibility and if one committee is inclined to be economical in its recommendations the work may be ineffectual because of the extravagance of another committee.

At present the appropriation bills are reported by committees as follows:

Army and Military Academy bills by Military Affairs; naval budget by the naval affairs; diplomatic and consular by foreign affairs; Indian bill by Indian affairs; agricultural by harbor by Rivers and Harbors Committee; postoffice budget by postoffices and postroads.

Fortifications, sundry civil, legislative, District of Columbia, pensions, general deficiency and urgent deficiency by the Committee on Appropriations.

The plan now forming is to have one big committee on appropriations to handle all of the annual budgets, which aggregate in their totals more than $2,000,000,000 for a Congress. The Democratic caucus has named a committee of leaders to investigate, during the recess this summer, the general subject of a change in the method of making appropriations and the arraignment by Representative Fitzgerald, of the present system will have influence with the caucus and with the House.

"To make the work of the House of Representative really effective," says Representative Fitzgerald, "there must be a radical change in its method of handling appropriations. Many times the present system has been condemned as illogical and unscientific. Real reform is impossible with eight committees of the House framing appropriation bills, while seven committees have legislative jurisdiction of the matters for which they recommend appropriations.

Further consideration deepens my conviction that one committee should be given control of all appropriations and that no legislation should be contained in appropriation bills."

Representative Fitzgerald refers to an agitation in the days of John Quincy Adams to prevent the carrying of legislation in appropriation bills. A rule now in force prohibits legislation unless in the interest of economy; nevertheless legislative riders frequently are found in the supply bills because no one raises a point of order or because they are written into the bills by the Senate or in conference.

If restrictions upon the contents of appropriation bills are found essential to the proper conduct of the public business as early as 1820," argues Fitzgerald, "it is apparent that such limitations are now imperative. The cost of the Federal Government has increased to a sum never contemplated in those early days and when genera legislation is inserted in appropriation bills it is usually properly considered by either house of Congress."

Sentiment for a budget committee is growing among Democrats, who are alarmed over growing expenditures despite economy promises, and the next session may result in the creation of a big House committee to handle all of the annual appropriation bills.

NAVAL GUN VIBRATION.

Conditions on a Warship When Heavy Firing Is In Progress.

The average civilian has a very vague idea as to the conditions inside a turret on a war vessel while heavy firing is going on.

The greatest force of the vibration from the firing of a gun is naturally just outside the muzzle, and that is outside the turret. So terrific is this vibration that if severe precautions were not taken the deck under the mussle would be ripped to pieces, sheet iron doors would be wrenched from their hangings and skylights shattered. To guard against these effects the deck under the gun mussle is re-enforced with steel plates about an inch thick and skylights are taken off and replaced with coverings of armor plate.

Of course a very considerable roar and jar are felt inside the turret. Men who are looking for the refinement of precaution recommend that gunners wear shoes with rubber cushioned soles and heels to lessen the jar on the deck.

The air vibration, due either to firing in one's own or some other turret, has caused many cases of gun deafness. To stuff the ears with cotton wool is, of course, the commonest expedient followed by men and officers alike. There is also what is called the Cheatham device, consisting of a mixture of clay and wool. It is very flexible, can be molded to any ear and still allows its wearer to hear orders.

Gun deafness may come immediately as a result of a ruptured ear drum or gradually owing to an injury to the auditory nerve.—London Answers.

The Easter Rabbit.

A symbol of Easter quite as familiar is the Easter hare, which is closely associated with the moon.

There have been all serts of fancies concerning the moon, from the phases of which the time of Easter is fixed, and among many nations the hare is the symbol of the moon itself.

The Hindu and Japanese artists painted the hare across the moon itself, while the Chinese represent the moon as a rabbit pounding rice in a mortar. An old, old Hindu moon legend says that once when Indra, disguised as a famishing pilgrim, was praying for food the hare, having nothing else to offer, threw itself into the fire that it might be cooked for his benefit, and the grateful Indra transported the animal to the moon, where those who have good imaginations declare that it is still to be seen.

NEW SEWER PLAN IS UNPOPULAR

Merchant Claims Impracticability Will Exist in Hunter Race

Contractor Frank Massaro and a squad of fifteen men started work early this morning on the new storm sewer which will run from the canal bridge to the Hunter Company's race-way. The men started work on the north end of the canal and Massaro expects the work to progress rapidly despite the fact that the frost is not yet out of the ground and the men will have hard going for a while. He stated today that nothing yet would lead him to believe that the work could not be completed before April 20, the required time.

The Hunter Company has been in communication with its attorney, Mr. Chapman of Syracuse, during the past week, in regard to the northern end of the sewer. The city wishes to run the sewer into the Hunter race where it will dump, and at the meeting of the Board of Public Works, the Hunter Company's representatives asked whether there was any possibility of the sewer interfering with their water supply or with the erection of some new abutments in the raceway at a later date. Although City Engineer Hill stated that the sewer flow would never interfere with the race, the Hunter Company decided to submit the plans of the race to Mr. Chapman and rest upon his decision. The city has contracted to indemnify the Hunter Company against any loss caused by the race sewer, but Messrs. Wise and Chadwick of the company stated that they would object to the sewer if there was any possibility of it holding up the plant even for a day. Mr. Chapman has not announced his decision today.

The decision of the Board of Public Works to run the new sewer into the Hunter tail-race was chacterized as a "near-sighted action" by a prominent merchant this morning. Accompanied by a Times reporter this man made an inspection of the conditions around the Hunter plant and the business man showed where the new sewer, as it is laid out now, might be impracticable. At present the specifications call for a sewer to run along the right wall of the old canal and to turn directly to the right when it arrives at a point almost opposite the Hunter office. Then the sewer is to run over the canal bed and under a wooden building on the Hunter property and will enter the tail race at right angles just where the tail race turns toward the river.

The Hunter Company contemplates the erection of a new supporting pillar for the plant as well as a new retaining wall at the upper side of the turn in the tail race. The Hunter Company will also insist that the new sewer enter the tail-race at the bottom of the race. This will necessitate some very deep tunneling by the contractor and when the sewer nears the race, the Hunter company will be forced to shut off power.

Farther down the tail-race the company has a water intake for its fire apparatus. While the city promises that no sanitary sewage shall enter the race, the company officials, at the board meeting, said they were informed that a great deal of sediment would be deposited in the race from the surface sewage. Some of this sediment might lodge in the intake and in case of fire not only the plant but thousands of dollars of surrounding property would be threatened.

By an additional length of sewer which will run probably 150 feet the city can reach a point opposite Hubbard street and then taking the sewer over the canal bed a straight run as far as 1st st. can be made. From 1st st. it is about 90 feet to the river.

The sewer would have to run across a plot of private land, which could probably be purchased, if necessary, for a nominal sum.

With the new storm sewer dumping directly into the river, a connection could be made with the main sanitary sewer, which, it is reported, is already inadequate for the needs of the down tow nsection. The city is bound to grow and in the course of a very few years additional sanitary sewers will be found necessary as the present sewer is only of 16-inch pipe, and it is overtaxed now.

A connection made to a 24-inch storm sewer would afford ample flow for the sanitary sewage disposal for many years to come. It is estimated that the additional 150 feet to Hubbard st. plus the 256 feet to the river bank will only cost the city about $1500 at the most, taking the present contract price as a basis. Such an arrangement would be a permanent improvement and would eliminate any more work on either sanitary or storm sewage disposal in the down town section for some years to come.

ALBANY LETTER DAY BY DAY

By Frderic T. Cardoze

Albany, April 5.—There is an impression, which is prevalent at the Capitol that the question as to whether the term of the governor shall be increase dto four from two, is to be seriously considered by the delegates to the Constitutional Convention. Certain of the members of the legislature who are delegates seem to think favorably of such an amendment to the State Constitution.

It is understood that Governor Whitman is favorably impressed with the suggested lengthening of the term of office of the governor, although the executive has made no formal or public utterance with reference to the subject. His close friends say that it is the belief of the governor that a term of two years is hardly adequate for the putting into operations of reforms or radical changes made by an administration.

A number of delegates who have been questioned as to their views upon the amendment in question have not been averse to declaring that the whole troublew ith the State service is that tenures of department heads and their deputies are too insecure. They point out that all of the appointive State offices can be removed by legislative action, or upon charges if the administration antagonistic to them so desires. This naturally leads to a general house-cleaning every two years, providing there is a change in the political complexion of State government, and many of the State departments find themselves in new hands just at the time the outgoing official becomes familiar with the duties of his office.

Following up this line of argument, the delegates in question hold that if the governor, who is the appointing power, held office for [illegible] two years, there would be a marked improvement in the administration of State affairs. They point out that the city of New York gives its mayor a term of four years at the present time, when at one time the term was of but two years duration, and that there is no agitation for a return to the ol dtwo year tenure. As an added argument they call attention to the fact that many of the States of the Union elect their governors every four years.

If a change is made so as to provide for the election of a governor once in four years, it is fair to assume that the terms of office of members of the Senate will be increased to four years also and the terms of assemblymen to two. If this change is made it is regarded as probable that the salaries of legislators will be increased to at least $2,500 a year.

The impending State Constitutional Convention follows two attempts to hold one this year. The Legislature of 1913 passed a bill which authorized special election to be held during that year to decide by a referendum whether there should be a Constitutional Convention. Governor Sulzer vetoed the measure. During the extra session which followed, a bill embodying the same proposition was introduced and passed, receiving the executive approval of Martin H. Glynn, who succeeded Governor Sulzer because of his impeachment. The special election was held last spring, resulting in a slender majority for the convention. In fact the majority was so small that its validity was questioned. After a review by the courts it was held that the Constitutional Convention had been called legally. The Republican party which was victorious at the polls also elected a majority of members to the Convention, or to be exact 100 out of 168 delegates.

REV. AND MRS. PECK PAY FRIENDS TRIBUTE

Rev. and Mrs. C. L. Peck, who have earned the respect and esteem of the people in general of this community, leave soon for their home in Sandy Creek. In a communication to The Evening Times this morning Mr. Peck gave the following expression:

"I am improving steadily, though slowly, am up a good part of the day, walk about, and out of doors a short distance, also ride out by auto, etc. Attended the Easter service and sermon at our church yesterday morning and was not over tired. By my physician's advice I am not to take active work this year at the approaching conference, but we are removing to the home recently purchased for my father and mother at Sandy Creek where I was pastor from 1898 to 1901.

I expect to spend some time recuperating in the Adirondacks and at the Thousand Island Park. Am planning to stop at Oswego for the opening session of our annual conference and then go on to Sandy Creek.

We have been the recipients of many fine and valuable gifts of money and otherwise from our parishioners. We leave Fulton with the warmest feelings of gratitude, affection and regret at parting. No more whole-souled, sympathetic, appreciative and generous people are to be found anywhere, and our pastorate here has been a delight. With all best wishes for the fullest success of Fulton's new and energetic movement for betterment.

Most cordially,

PHYSICIANS TO TEST SANITY OF GATES

Frank Gates, who was arrested last week on a charge of cruelty and non-support preferred by his wife, is still languishing in the city jail. He has been unable to find any one to go his bail which was fixed at $1,000.

His actions before and after arrest have led Chief Dyer to suspect that his mind is affected. The case has been called for tomorrow morning and if it is deemed necessary at that time an examination will be made into his sanity, and if the doctors find he is not rational he will probably be committed to some institution at once.

His wife is a colored woman and she charged that Gates beat her as well as neglecting to provide food and raiment for her. She announced her intention of leaving him for good after the preliminary hearing before Judge Wilson last week, and she has removed all her belongings from their former dwelling.

AN OLD RESIDENT WAS BURIED TODAY

Mrs. Nellie Gardner, for fifty-two years a resident of Fulton, died last night at the home of her daughter, Mrs. E. M. Anderson, of West Broadway. Mrs. Gardner was born in Fulton in Oneida st., but of late years she has made her home with Mrs. Anderson.

She is survived by her husband, Castle H. Gardner; one son, Harold Gardner, of Wisconsin, and two daughters Mrs. Anderson and Mrs. R. C. Shafer, of Syracuse.

Rev. M. G. Buck of the First Baptist church officiated at the funeral which was held at the home of Mrs. Anderson this afternoon at 2 o'clock.

JUNIOR KNIGHTS DINED

Youth invaded the favorite lounging place of sedate men of affairs Friday night, when the boys belonging to the Junior Knights of the First M. E. church were dined by their teacher, H. L. Paddock. At the conclusion of the dinner a business meeting was held and the boys' appreciation of their teacher's generosity was expressed in true boyish fashion.

"TRADE AT HOME"

Public Spiritedness of Proprietor of Fair Store Should Be Emulated.

While Fulton-made goods are in demand all over the U. S. and while goods are being made here for shipment to all points of the compass, a lot of satisfaction is gained by knowing that there exists demand right at home for Fulton-made merchandise.

The most recent evidence of the fact is the purchase of 100 dozens of suits of underwear by Samuel Waldhorn, proprietor of the Fair Store, from the William H. Spanwick Manufacturing Co. This line of merchandise is of course made in Fulton by Fulton's skilled labor. The example set by Mr. Waldhorn should become a basis upon which merchant and manufacturer should unite.

Indeed, the precedent established by Mr. Waldhorn will go a long way toward a realization of what it means to "trade at home."

K. OF C. BALL WILL BE IMPORTANT FUNCTION

To the accompaniment of sweet strains dispensed by Buell's orchestra, the Knights of Columbus and their wives and sweethearts will greet the opening of the post-Lenten social season tonight with the annual Easter Ball of the lodge. The orchestra will play the very latest in dance music and from 9 o'clock until two the entertainment will continue.

At the hour of midnight, a dainty collation will be served and it is possible that a few remarks will be made by some of the leading members of the local council.

A large delegation is expected from Oswego and many invitations have been sent to other nearby towns.

TUGBOAT ALMOST READY FOR SEASON'S WORK

The tugboat "Avery" owned by the Pierce Sand Co., is suspended in the air by wire cables slings in the lower canal lock. The boat will remain in its position until painting and caulking has been done upon the hull.

The "Avery" was formerly owned by the aBttle Island Paper Co. Last year she sank at the company's dock, where she lay until bought by the Sand Co., who had quite a job of raising the hull from the mud. Pumps were used to draw the water from the hull and strong cables fastened about the hull, together with the pulling power of "Avery" in its present position.

"GOD KNOWS US THOROUGHLY"

That Was Theme of Easter Sermon by Rev. M. G. Buck.

A large congregation assembled at the First Baptist church last night and the pastor delivered a sermon which was heard with interest. He spoke as follows:

"By reason of our wonderful progress many men have come to believe that civilization is a substitute for God and that they can get along in the world without Him.

"We are the heirs of 40 centuries of civilization and are living under the best civilization the world has ever known. And yet men who know how to make wonderful machines and build great ships and cities and rule kingdoms do not know how to live; they cannot take care of themselves. All civilizations are incomplete and insufficient for they are made by imperfect man and the highest civilization is inadequate to meet our needs because there is a deal of evil in every one which it cannot reach.

"We have greater helps than any people had in Christ's time but we are just as dependant on God as were men to whom He said "Without Me ye can do nothing." The greatest men have limitations. God has none. Meager are the resources of everf man. Infinite are God's resources. In spite of all the centuries of progress all the achievements of man, all the knowledge, wealth, advantages, abilities and power we are obligd to draw on resources outside of ourselves, to employ the forces of nature and to use her productions and laws.

"Alone, without the alliance of God, no man is able to throw off the world. To command himself, to build a strong character, and to do a great work for his generation. Because God is God He personally interests Himself in our well being. The God of many Christians is in the sky. In their thoughts He is afar off. They are afraid of Him so they put Him as far away as possible.

"He is the one whom they cannot love as a near, intimate, unequaled friend, and so they do not get much out of their thought of God. They miss great blessing and joy and a wealth of good.

"Christ taught God is a spirit in dwelling in the world as a soul in a body, that he is our loving father, our perfect friend and companion our supreme comforter, our sure strength in temptation God can never be less than Christ says he is and never less than Christ was. And because God is God He is the only one who knows us thoroughly, knows ohr limitations our weaknesses, intentions, trials and needs and is the only one who is able to give and knows when to give sufficient help to each.

"There is inspiration in that thot that he recognizes every man's worth and work though unappreciated, misjudged, censured and forgotten by the world, and that he isw ith every one who is doing his best for himself and his fellow being.

When one needs God His help is adequate and immediate. Time and friends go but God remains, so there are a few questions that I would like to ask and answer tonight.

(1) What will you do when you have failed?

I present unto you Jesus.

What will you do when your heart is breaking?

I present Jesus and He said "Believe me."

What will you do when it is dark?

Again I present Jesus and He said "Believe me."

What will you do when sin binds you?

Again I present Jesus and He said "Believe me."

What will you do when friends forsake you?

Again I present Jesus He said "Believe me."

What will you do when death comes?

I present Jesus He said "Believe Me."

What will you do in the judgment?

Again I present Jesus He said "Believe Me."

Last, what will you do to make life count?

Again I present Jesus He said "Believe Me."

R. B. TAYLOR'S PURCHASE

Cattlebreeders' Magazine Describes Hunter & Taylor's Recent Purchase.

The March number of "Holstein-Friesian World" describes Hunter & Taylor's fine young bull, King Pontiac Abbekerk Gretel, which was purchased recently by the firm. The magazine conveys the information that the bull is from Tidy Abberkerk Princess Gretel, who made for her owners last spring, the splendid record of 32.3 pounds of butter in seven days.

Continuing the magazine says that Hunter & Taylor's bull has two grandsires with 13 daughters whose records range from 30 to 44 pounds of butter in seven days. It is therefore apparent that the firm owns an animal of more than unusual merit.

One of the largest congregations in the history of the church crowded the Presbyterian auditorium yesterday morning, when twenty or more candidates received baptism sixty-two members were received into the membership of the church. This is said to be the largest number of persons ever received in one class. This represents partial results of the two weeks' service recently conducted by the pastor. The number of people partaking of the communion was also said to be the largest ever received. The Bible school also surpassed all former records of attendance. At the vesper service, the church was again well filled when the chorus gave a very pleasing Easter program. A soprano solo by Mrs. Joy was sung with great acceptability to the congregation. A French horn solo by Mr. Theodore Webb was rendered with splendid tonal effect. Mrs. Thomas Hunter organ accompaniments were such as to mark her unusual ability. The incidental solo by Miss Marian Lake and Mr. Amsefmet were also very pleasing The every member canvas has proven a great success, and the church is in a most hopeful condition.

RECTOR SCORED DAY'S THEORIES

St. Mary's Church Crowded to Hear Father Lindsman's Easter Sermon

There was an impressive Easter service at the Church of the Immaculate Conception yesterday. The church was tastefully decorated with palms, azaleas and ferns, and a large choir rendered a splendid program of music, under the direction of the organist, Frederic Kenyon. Notable for its excellence was the offertory solo, "Ave Maria", rendered by a trio consisting of Miss Frauc LaLonde, soprano; Miss Victoria Beauchamp, contralto; and Lawrence Ranger, tenor.

Father Lindsman read the Gospel and told the story of the first Easter day. Then taking for his text, "Who shall roll back the stone for us," he told of the labors of Christ in behalf of the whole world, and of His victory over death and the grave.

"Christianity would be a religion without foundation if itw ere not for the fact of Christ's resurrection," said Father Lindsman, "But that fact proved conclusively that He was God as well as man and it established His divinity before all the world. He left the message that He had gone before His disciples into Galilee, and in the same manner has He gone before us. His hands are stretched out to us this morning. He has gone before and He has prepared the way for us."

Father Lindman scored the twentieth century paganism, and the scientific forms of religion. He said that the knowledge that His death would help to raise the human race another peg in evolution was little comfort to the dying man; the soldier, dying, wished something more tangible than the knowledge that his death would be the complete end of him, and that there was no eternal life. He compared Christ to a volunteer and told how volunteers were called for when an army wished to sacrifice a few men deliberately in order to save the lives of many. Christ deliberately sacrified Himself in order that the way to heaven might be opened for countless souls.

It was announced that the Holy Name society will go to Holy Communion in a body on Sunday, April 18, and at the meeting of the society on that date, there will be a reception of new members. Father Lindsman urgd the men of the parish to join the Holy Name Society.

The parochial school, which was to have opened tomorrow after the week's vacation, will not be opened until Wednesday. In view of the inclement weather last week, Father Lindsman decided that the children would enjoy another day of recreation.

Gov. Whitman's Administration

Charles Seymour Whitman has been Governor of the State of New York for less than three months.

The legislature, Republican in both branches, has been in session less than three months.

It does not take critics, who are bound to be critics, three months, three weeks, three days or three minutes to criticize. Bein ga critic is the easiest attainment in the world. It does not require knowledge, experience or brains. For instance, those critics still harping about the "$18,000,000 blunder" flaunt their lack of knowledge and brains to the reading public.

When the present administration began its duties on January 1, 1915, what was there for it to do? It had a stupendous task. The task was to give to the state an economic, efficient and businesslike administration. With the conditions existing on January 1, 1915, it was impossible td do this within three months. It would be impossible to do it with a small business to say nothing of a business of the immense proportions of the business of the state.

It will take more than three months; yes, it will take more than three years, to place the business of the state on a proper basis.

If Governor Whitman's administration makes a good beginning it will have done well.

It is making ag ood beginning in many ways. It has abolished some extravagant and useless departments. it should abolish more. It has dropped some useless so-called employes from the state payrolls. It should drop more. It has improved some departments and it wil improve more. It must keep a sharp lookout against the passage of bad laws, even when "humanity cries for them."

In these days every one wants a "pension" of some kind, and it seems to be unpopular to stand out against the granting of "pensions." These are the days of class legislation—special privilege legislation. Any administration to be successfu must stand out against al these sometimes popular and impractical ideas and attempt to run the government upon the principles which are the foundation of our form of government.

Taking a stand for the right is sometimes unpopular at the moment, but it is always popular in the long run. It is too early to judge the Whitman administration. Up to the present it has made a fair beginning. —Albany Knickerbocker Press.

LOCAL ANGLERS GET SOME FINE TROUT

Local trout fishermen, on the whole, got poor pickings Saturday on their initial trips to the haunts of the finny tribe. George Brooker and Joseph Murphy of the West Side were probably the most fortunate. Brooker came home with two speckled beauties averaging well over two pounds and he said he had the thime of his life in landing them. Murphy caught several good-sized fish, but he also stated that the fish were biting poorly.

The cold water and the fact that many of the streams are still covered with ice has kept many of the local anglers around the stove. The change in temperature and the rain today will probably improve conditions to a great extent and ceveral parties are being organized to go to Redfield, where they say the fish are present in great numbers—that is to say—in the streams.

The local sporting goods stores report big sales of fishing tackle and most of the anglers are only waiting for fine weather.

TAX COLLECTIONS GOOD DESPITE DULL TIMES

City Chamberlain Geo. Washburn stated today that the tax collections for the past month were almost as large as those of March, 1914. In view of the fact that in other cities collections are falling far below the mark of last year, the report of the Fulton collector speaks well for conditions here.

Mr. Washburn said that a decrease was only to be expected because of hard times at present, but that the amounts varied little from last year's, and that the collections were better than he had anticipated.

STATE STARTS WORK ON ROCHESTER STREET

In charge of M. Sullivan, a gang of twelve men began work this morning in moving Rochester st. on the canal side of First st. over to a point almost directly in front of the Quirk theatre. The street formerly ran on the property owned by E. J. Schem, and the change in the thoroughfare has been contemplated for some time. It was not until today, however, that that state decided to start the work. The street will be paved and put in good condition by the state and will follow its old course down along the canal bank.

EASTER DAY AT ZION CHURCH

Beautiful Choral Service Was Rendered by the Vested Choir. Mr. Peters Spoke

Congregations that taxed the church to its utmost capacity attended the Easter services at the Zion Episcopal church yesterday. The interior of the edifice was tastefully decorated with potted plants, ferns, azaleas and Easter lilies. The vested choir of twenty voices rendered a special program of music.

Before the service there was an impressive procession, headed by the crucifer and consisting of the choir and six acolytes, followed by the rector. The service embodied a high celebration of the Holy Eucharist and Tours' "Festive Service" was sung. The soloists were: Miss Vera Bovard, soprano; Mr. Huggins, tenior; and Mr. Atkins, bass. The choirmaster, Bird Atkins, directed the singing.

Rev. M. J. Peters, the rector, took his text from the first Epistle of St. Pau to the Corinthians, and imparted an Easter message to the congregation.

At 4.30 o'clock in the evening, there was a special choral service and Mr. Peter's sermon was addressed to the younger people of the church. After the service potted plants were distributed among the children.

The Easter musical program will be repeated at the services next Sunday.

War: Pathos and Humor

British General Headquarters in France, April 2.—Even in wartime the British army manages to preserve its habitual smartness and completeness in appearance. Not a single item of equipment ever seems to be missing, and every man is dressed and equipped exactly the same.

On your way to the trenches you must pass through the rest billets of the men who are having their turn off duty. You enter one of them through a perfect sea of liquid mud. It is raining hard, and the whole countryside is overhung with a dull, grey, wet mist. Anything more cheerless it would be difficult to imagine. The village itself is almost deserted, and presents a picture of desolation and ruin. Some of the houses are intact and others are lacking walls or roofs, or show great gaping holes where the German shells have entered. A few women and children are wandering about and a few stray dogs.

This is all the signs of life you see. There is occasionally the roar of a big gun or howitzer, which is engaged in keeping the Germans busy, allowing them no repose by night or day. The village consists of a few straggling streets, and the houses on either side are divided by a lane of deep, thick mud, which seems to suck you in at every step. The country is absolutely flat. Heavy ploughed fields surround you, and your horizon is only broken by occasional patches of wood or long lines of poplars marking the roads.

A thousand yards away, you are told, are the British trenches, but you see nothing of them, and, except for the occasional shelling, you might be miles away from a battlefield. The cold and rain, the flatness of the land, and, above all, the mud sends the shivers down your back, and you are seized with a sudden fit of loneliness. You involuntarily say to yourself, this is the most horrible country you have ever seen." You are, in fact, not far wrong. This part of France is certainly most unattractive. They grow hops and beets.

Every beet field has a corner put aside for the cultivation of hops. Poles about 20 feet high are stuck in the ground at intervals, joined at the top by wire. The plant is trained up these, but in winter time you only see endless poles, which seem to be there just to mock our troops by inviting them to hang up the washing they havn't got to hang.

Then, again, to add to the melancholy of the scene, are the eternal little wooden crosses, which you see everywhere, each marking the last resting place of a dead hero who has given his life for his country. But it is the mud which depresses you most of all. The ground never apparently dries. The roads are seas of mud, but the fields prohibit walking altogether. You could not march infantry or cavalry or drag a gun or a wagon across them in their present state.

So flat is the country that, although you may be in the presence of thousands of men and animals, you never see them until you are right in their midst. You notice one strange thing about the doors of the houses in these villages. Each one of them has some strange chalk marks on the outside. You see Fc or Ac, or some other letter, and then scrawled in almost illegible characters, the word "billets" for so many men. You think what an awful place in which to have to stop. Then, just when you are wishing yourself in some sunny spot or dry ground, the distant refrain of a familiar air is wafted from the road which leads from the trenches.

As it grows louder you hear the steady splush splush of hundreds of feet sinking into the slush in perfect unison. You then catch the words of the song, or the refrain of the tune which is being whistled. There is "Tipperary," but "Sister Susie's Sewing Shirts for Soldiers" seems to be even more popular. All sorts of "ragtime" refrains, however, are popular at the front. Then, swinging round the bend of the road into the village comes the battalion.

You see a solid phalanx of khaki-clad figures, each bearing so many different articles of equipment that they look almost as broad as they are long. The whole battalion looks as if it had been taken bodily and dipped in thick mud. Officers, non-commissioned officers and men are plastered with it. The knapsacks are the same. The puttees are hidden by it, the hands and faces are plastered with it. Only the rifles are approximately clean.

These men have just finished their allotted span in the trenches. They are weary, chiefly from lack of sleep, but otherwise you would imagine they were just coming in from maneuvres and returning to barracks before going on leave, rather than merely having a short rest. When they have approached near enough and you are able to catch a glimpse of faces beneath the outer coating of Flanders, you see a fat, cheerful, happy-looking lot of English lads, full of humor and good spirits.

Every man seems to find something in these dismal surroundings to afford him mirth and comfort. They are not on their way to some luxurious town, full of shops and nice warm beds. Their destination is the miserable, half-destroyed villages, with the strange calabalistic signs on the doors I have attempted to describe. Comfort and happiness in life are purely relative and these men are perfectly cheerful because they have just scaped from the filth and mud and constant alarms of the trenches to what is to them the acme of luxury, a spell in a ruined village.

The cheerfulness of the soldiers is astonishing after five months of this sort of life, which really consists in hiding in the mud to avoid death. It is also infectious, far more so than any of the dread epidemics which usually overwhelm armies in the field. The arrival of the battalion causes the village to spring to life. The inhabitants, chiefly women and children, hurry outside and greet the returning warriors in a mixture of French and broken English.

The village, which appeared the most forsaken spot on earth a few minutes before, now seems one of the most cheerful. I attribute the good spirits of the British soldier very largely to his proximity to home, as well as to the very great care which is taken of his diet and comfort. It is not like being in Africa or the Soudan, or India, where you may go for months without news from home, and imagine you are forgotten or that all of your friends are dead.

So complete is the organization of every branch of the army that every soldier at the front receives his letters and parcels and newspapers, whether he be in billets or in the trenches, sometimes the day after but never later than two days after, they are posted. At headquarters, for instance, we get the daily papers at 3 o'clock in the afternoon of their publication.

WRITER FORETOLD TITANIC DISASTER

MADE A DEEP IMPRESSION

Many Anecdotes of Famous Author of Sea Stories—Began and Finished in One Night His First Effort, "The Destruction of the Unfit," Writing on a Washtub Until Dawn.

Morgan Robertson, one of the foremost writers of sea stories, who died suddenly in his hotel room in Atlantic City, proved that he was a prophet as well as a teller of tales. In 1898 he wrote "Futility," in which he vividly described the wreck of the Titan, the largest and finest steamer ever constructed, the wreck being caused by an iceberg in the vicinity of the Titanic catastrophe. When the Titanic went down, just fifteen years after the book had been written, the similarity of names in the imaginary book and the locality where the ship hit the iceberg made a profound impression. Mr. Robertson followed the sea for many years before he took up literature.

Illustrating the impossibility of one man knowing all there is to know, Robertson told this story:

"I used to sail with a skipper who was a good seaman, but he was what you might call all at sea when he was on land. He was driving one day along a country road in England when he came to a signpost. An index finger pointed in the direction from which the skipper had come, and the inscription on it read, 'Selkirk, 12 miles.'

"Now, Selkirk was the town for which the skipper was bound. He did not want to turn around, so he climbed the post, tore the sign loose and nailed it to a post on the other side of the road, so the hand pointed in the direction he was going. Then he climbed back into the buggy and drove on."

"I admire a liar," Robertson used to say, "even when his prevarications strain my credulity. A friend of mine, who objects to efforts to pry into his personal affairs, recently limped into my workshop.

"'What's the matter with your foot?' I asked, more to be polite than because I cared what was the trouble.

"Then he gained my everlasting admiration by a display of nerve and mendacity I never saw equaled. 'An eel stepped on it,' he said."

Gets Clippings on "Ghosts."

Robertson used to delight in telling this story:

"Sometime ago I gave an order to a concern which furnished newspaper clippings, telling the manager that I wanted ghost stories. I undertook to explain that what I wanted was fiction that dealt with spirits and spooks, and the clipping man said he understood and would fix me all right.

"In a few days I began receiving clippings about ghosts. One of the slips was taken from a country paper in Pennsylvania and it said that a rival sheet had 'given up the ghost.' Another clipping, taken from a Louisville paper, was a pert paragraph from some other paper regarding Bryan and the Democracy, over which was the caption, 'Hamlet Without the Ghost.'

"Another clipping referred to the production of Ibsen's 'Ghost' in London, while the fourth was an editorial paragraph from a North Carolina paper in which a political convention was referred to as a 'ghost dance.' I never realized before that there were so many kinds of ghosts."

In 1896 while he was in New York a friend handed Robertson one of Rudyard Kipling's sea stories and told him to read it. He did and that night he began and finished his first short story, writing on a washtub until dawn. He called it "The Destruction of the Unfit." After a long delay it was accepted by a magazine which paid $25 for it. During the year that followed Mr. Robertson wrote and sold about twenty short stories of the sea. Since then not a year and perhaps not a month passed in which one or more of his sea pieces did not appear.

SAW WAR MAIMED TRADED.

Mrs. Maugan Says Limbs of Prisoners Were Matched.

Mrs. May E. Maugan, fashion buyer, arrived on the Arabic after having spent six weeks in Paris and paid a high tribute to the women of the French capital. She saw the first exchange of prisoners that took place at Boulogne.

"The women of Paris are wonderful," she said. "They have taken hold of the city and seem to be running it. You find them everywhere, on the tram cars, managing the shops, delivering the mail and filling thousands of positions hitherto occupied by the men who are now at the front. They are sad, though, and I have seen many of them crying. Yet they are brave and steadfast and make no protest against the war.

"I saw the first exchange of prisoners at Boulogne. The English and French were all crippled. Some had lost arms, others legs and one or two both legs. The exchange was on the loss of limbs. For example, a German with an arm gone would be exchanged for an Englishman or Frenchmen in the same condition."

20,000 ACRES TO COLLEGE.

Middlebury, Vt.—A tract of more than 20,000 acres of forest land in this state is bequeathed to Middlebury college, to be preserved as a forest park forever, under the will of the late Joseph H. Battell.

Mr. Battell, who was publisher of the Middlebury Register, was greatly interested in forest preservation and had been acquiring virgin timber lands for more than forty years.

A mountain in Lincoln and Warren, one of the highest peaks in the state, is given to the United States government.

The town of Middlebury receives two large tracts of land for park purposes and a fund of $9,000 for park maintenance.

The lands bequeathed to the college lie along the crest of the Green mountains and extend into three counties and eight townships.

In addition the college will receive as a residuary bequest, at the expiration of a ten years' trust, the Battell block, a large business structure in the village; the Middlebury Register and a number of farms.

LIVED FOUR YEARS AS A MAN.

Death of Massachusetts Woman Reveals Her Long Masquerade.

Springfield, Mass.—The death of Miss Florestine Albertine Beaudoin, whose body was found in Williamsett, revealed that she had lived disguised as a man for four years. She lived with her sister as "Albert Beaudoin" and worked in the paper mills of Holyoke. The only motive suggested for her long masquerade is that she could earn more as a man for the support of herself and her sister, who is a widow. Her death was due to heart trouble.

After her day's work in Holyoke she was loading a wagon with furniture from the house which she occupied with her sister. A policeman found her leaning against the wagon and asked the supposed "Albert Beaudoin" if he needed any help. The woman replied that she would be all right in a little while. Later she was found lying by the wagon, and she died soon after a physician arrived.

BELGIAN CHILDREN THANK AMERICANS

Twins Send Letter to President, Who Promptly Replies.

Washington.—An exchange of letters between President Wilson and two little Belgians in Brussels, in which the children thanked the president for food sent by Americans and the president expressed his appreciation of their gratitude, has been made known at the White House. The children, twins, nine years old, wrote:

Dear Mr. Wilson—Thank you very much for the good bread. The poor people in our villages were starving, for they have nothing to eat, but now that you have sent over to our dear little country a big provision of wheat, both rich and poor can live—thanks to the Americans. Best love and wishes from little

Pussy's brother added, "I join in with my sister in thanking you, too, for it is jolly good bread, enough to satisfy any schoolboy's hunger."

In reply the president sent this letter in his own handwriting:

My Dear Little Friends—Your letter touched me very deeply, and I thank you for it with all my heart. It makes me very happy to think that what generous Americans have done to relieve the hunger and distress in your country has brought you the help you needed and given you a little happiness in the midst of these terrible days of war. I hope that you will grow up to be strong to do the work that will have to be done in the days of peace that are coming. It would be a great pleasure to me if some day I might see you both when those happier times have come. Your sincere friend,

SLIPPERS FOR HIS BURIAL.

Wanted Comfortable Footwear and Quilt in Coffin.

Los Angeles, Cal.—In case he was murdered $5,000 was to be taken from his estate to aid in hunting his slayers. This was the provision E. F. Kellner, Arizona hunter and pioneer, who died in Venice, Cal., made in his will.

In giving minute directions as to the method of his burial Kellner directed that a coffin be secured of copper from Globe, Ariz., where he resided many years; that he be dressed in a gray suit and comfortable slippers and covered with a quilt without decoration.

French Air Men in 10,000 Reconnoissances Have Lost Heavily.

Paris.—An official statement giving statistics concerning the aerial flights of the French air men during the eight months of the war says:

"Approximately 10,000 aerial reconnoissances have been made, amounting to 18,000 hours in the air. The distance covered was 1,800,000 kilometers (over 1,116,000 miles).

"Unfortunately these results were not obtained without serious losses, which equal and sometimes even surpass other methods of warfare."

About Sports Generally

By Frank G. Menke

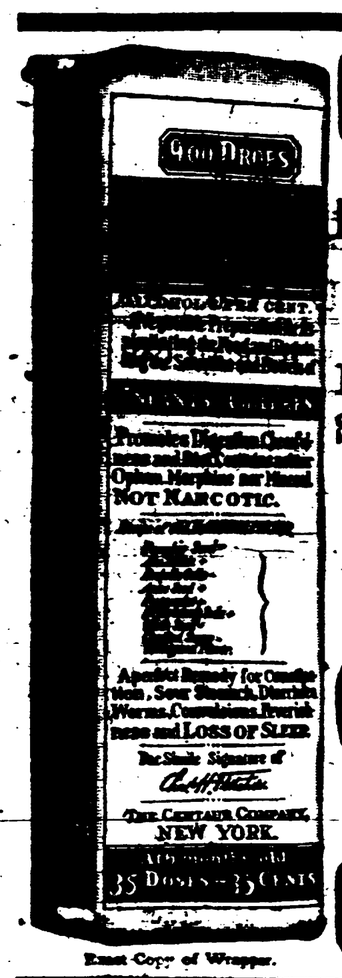
New York, April 4.—The Federal League will pry the lid off the baseball season next Saturday, four days before the opening games in the National and American Leagues. Parades, fanfares of trumpets and all that goes to make the opening game a thing apart will be seen and heard in four cities. At least seventy-two ball players who have been busy conditioning and getting the winter rust out of their muscles at southern training camps will get into action and start the third year of the new league's existence in Brooklyn, Baltimore, Kansas City and Chicago.

Though the western teams have been in the circuit during the three years of its existence, Saturday's games will mark the opening of the league's second year in the East. The newest entry to the league, Newark, will play at Baltimore. Pittsburgh will start in Kansas City and St. Louis in Chicago.

The Brooklyn team will begin its second season with the Buffalo nine as visitor at Washington Park, and the prospects of bringing a flag to the borough at the other end of the subway are bright. The team will start under the command of a new manager, Lee Magee, former St. Louis Cardinal, who is the only new leader in the circuit, and judging from the reports that have come up from the spring training camp, has has succeeded in injecting plenty of snap and dash into his players.

Trades and purchases have brought a great deal of strength to the Brooklyn team since the close of last season. Magee has gathered in the biggest individual star in the league in Benny Kauff, who came from the Indianapolis team. Kauff led the organization last year in batting and base running. His average with the stick was .366 and he had 75 stolen bases. Kauff is only 25 years old and is beginning his sixth year in professional baseball. In 1911 and 1912 he was tried out by the New York American League team but turned bac kto the minors. With Hartford, in 1913, he developed so fast that he was on the way to the majors via Indianapolis of the American Association when the Indianapolis team in the Federal League gained his services. He bats and throws left handed.

Besides Kauff, ho with Steve Evans and George Anderson will make up the Brooklyn outfield, forming what Magee calls the best balanced outfield he has met in his experience in big league ball. a number of other strong players will be with the Brooglyn team this season. The catching department has been bolstered with Mike Simon, who was a St. Louis Fed last year, while to the strong pitching staff of Tom Seaton, Ed Lafitte, Joe Finneran, Jim Bluejacket, Byron Houck, Bill Chappelle, Rudie Sommers, Don Marion, Finis Wilson and Bert Maxwell, William Upham has been added. Upham with with the Rochester team of the International League last season and was the iron man of the circuit.



The greatest strength of the team is in the outfield, with Kauff, Eveans, who was right behind Kauff in the batting, and Anderson, with Claude Cooper and the veteran Danny Murphy in reserve. The infield does not come quite up to the standard of the outer garden, but with Magee directing the team from an infield position this department may show unlooked for strength.

Brooklyn fans will have a chance to say hello to an old favorite on opening day, for Jack Dalton, the erstwhile Dodger slugger, is now in the lineup of the Buffeds. Cy Marshall, last season with the Phillies, is a new pitcher with the Buffeds. Then there will be Hal Chase and Russell Ford, Hugh Bedient, pitching hero in the Boston Red Sox-Giants worlds series of 1812, and Clyde Engle, all well known to fans of Greater New York. Howard Ehmke, a minor league find, last season with Los Angeles of the Coast League, is also under Larry Schlafly. Ehmke was bought by Washington after he had won nine straight games in his first season as a professional and may be seen in action against the Brookfeds.

HOW SHIPS CAN AVOID THE DANGERS OF A SUBMARINE.

Several methods of checkmating a submarine are shown in this diagrammatic drawing, prepared especially for this newspaper, the New York Herald and the London Sphere. In the foreground are the enemy's periscopes, to which a merchantman is turning his tail. This position throws the wake of the vessel toward the oncoming torpedo, and may succeed in deflecting it to right or left. In every case it is necessary for the merchant skipper when in dangerous waters where a submarine may be encountered to drive his ship at full speed and at the same time steer an irregular course. In previous cases the enemy's "under sea boat" has appeared abeam of the ship about to be attacked and in such a position that the merchantman could not suddenly turn and ram her, but should two or three craft be in company when attacked then there might be a chance for one of them to ram while their enemy was engaged with the others, for it must be remembered that no fighting craft can be put out of action quicker than a submarine if it is touched either by the bows of its foe or by a shot from a light quick firer. In every case the merchant captain will have to think and act quickly immediately he sights his sinister foe. The map in the left hand bottom corner shows the area of Germany's so-called "blockade" with the "open" channel to the north of the Shetlands and extending down to Holland

Woman's World

Why a Society Woman Joined a Labor Union.

MRS. J. SERGEANT CRAM.

Mrs. John Sergeant Cram, society woman of New York city, has joined a union. She has taken out her card in the Musicians' local No. 210, has paid her dues for the year, and now the cause of labor is her cause in reality.

"It is my affair and your affair if a woman drags out her life in a sweatshop," said Mrs. Cram when interviewed about her reasons for having joined a union. "All of us are in a measure responsible for the bad conditions under which she works.

"I don't like this talk about improving the working people," she explained. "The only way we can help them is by helping them elevate their own standards. The better they are paid for their work, the more wage in return for their labor they can improve themselves."

Mrs. Cram attends the meetings of the Woman's Trades Union league in New York city and is deeply interested.

"Why, these women workers are the most altruistic human beings in the world," she said. "You have no idea how generous and self sacrificing they are. Men have said that women do not stand by each other and have no loyalty to other women. It may have been true before women went into the world to earn their living, but it isn't now. These organized women are just as faithful to each other and the principles for which they stand as men."

Those who work for a better adjustment of social and industrial conditions may see in Mrs. Cram's act a forecast of a finer future. It is one of the little straws which point the way of an evolution which will end in an understanding more friendly and cooperative than the traditional capitalist-laborer antagonism has yet permitted.

GARBAGE AND REFUSE.

Five Rules For Collection and Disposal Advocated.

Mrs. C. H. Wilmerding of Flushing, N. Y., has given a great deal of attention to the question of garbage disposal. In a recent address which she delivered before the American Civic association she laid down the following five rules as necessary for all municipalities:

"First.—The city must collect the garbage every day.

"Second.—Garbage, refuse and ash cans must not be allowed to stand in the streets and alleys at all.

"Third.—Tin cans, sticks, paper, broken china or any refuse other than garbage must be kept separate and in a suitable receptacle.

"Fourth.—Ashes must be kept separate.

"Fifth.—Garbage must be sorted and pressed and not allowed to spoil.

"Failure to observe these rules must be reported and fines imposed."

Milady's Mirror

Dew as a Beautifier.

The heavy dews of early spring mornings are a cosmetic that is so easily found and used it escapes notice. The face and neck, arms and hands bathed in fresh dew to be found on grass and plants at sunrise grow white and soft and pure in texture. At night the careful cleansing of the dust of the day, with plenty of good cold cream to fill the pores with cleanly substance to be absorbed, should never be neglected; then in the morning, with rubbers and warm wrappings, to bathe face and hands and neck and arms with cool dews will prove beautifying.

After this is done bed may be sought again for a short, restful nap before breakfast, and women who long for beautiful complexions will eat a hearty morning meal. Nature is a great teacher, and only to watch the feathered and furred and hairy creatures is to note that they are always hungry in the morning. Better a couple of meals a day, leaving off the midday lunch, than no breakfast and a hearty meal at noon.

Sour Milk For Facial Blemishes.

The French method of applying sour milk directly to the face to relieve it of blemishes is splendid—so it is said. A mask is made of Turkish toweling, the face coated with skin food, after which the mask is wet with hot sour milk and applied to the face as hot as can be borne. When it cools it is again dipped in the hot milk and again applied. One must use judgment as to how long the applications should be continued, for some skins are more tender than others. After the treatment the skin should be gently wiped with a soft towel and a soothing astringent lotion applied. This steaming treatment is ideal for it cleans the skin, opens the pores and gives a becoming and healthful bloom.

The cure may be hastened, provided the skin will stand it, by holding the head over a heated stove or radiator when the mask is on the face.

Exercises For the Lips.

An exercise for beautifying the lips and making them facile and flexible is the pronunciation of the vowel sounds—"ah-oh," "ah-oh-ee," "ah-oh-ee-oo." This is to be repeated ten times each at ten different times a day. A sentence which is approved by many elocution teachers for the exercise of the lips is, "Most men want poise and more royal margin."

Actresses and actors are given many exercises not only for the cultivation of pleasing voices, but to beautify their lips, mouths and other features. It is through perfect exercise that the actor's face is kept so youthful and by which all the muscles of the face are perfectly developed without fixing it.

To Develop the Arms.

Extend the arms horizontally, then imagine a heavy weight in each hand. Slowly force this weight up until the palms meet over the head, at the same time resisting the effort to raise the weight. Lower the arms and the imaginary weight in the same manner. Massaging the arms with olive oil or cocoa butter will help to make them plump. Anoint the palm of the hand with the cocoa butter and gently but thoroughly knead the flesh from the wrist to the elbow, working in the cocoa butter at the same time.

Arranging the Coiffure.

In order not to be plain one does not need to dress elaborately. First study the mode of arranging your hair and select that which is not only smart, but the one most becoming to you. Do not in the hustle and bustle to begin the day's work think that the quickest arranged coiffure will suffice. Neither be misled by the thought that a tight, closely arranged coiffure is suitable to all faces. In fact, there are but few faces that will not lose their beauty by such a coiffure.

Simple Tooth Powder.

A safe and simple tooth powder is precipitated chalk and orris root, which any druggist will mix for you in small quantities. Another equally safe but less pleasing powder is finely shaved castile soap, one part, and precipitated chalk, two parts. If this powder is used every morning and then if after each meal and before retiring the teeth are brushed with tepid water containing an antiseptic decay can be warded off.

Benefits of Olive Oil.

Olive oil taken every morning half an hour before breakfast is good for removing liver spots and otherwise clearing the complexion. Take a teaspoonful of the best olive oil before breakfast and the same quantity half an hour after the latest meal. In a few months this will clear the skin and otherwise improve your health. Drink plenty of water between meals. Avoid hot bread, rich pastries and sauces.

Value of Sunshine.

Sunshine, in spite of tanning and freckles, is good for the skin. So is fresh air. Both united give bloom and color to it, and, if the air and sunshine are taken early and regularly before the farmer has lost its morning freshness and while the latter has not yet gained its power to tan, a beautiful [illegible]

One Easter eve I dreamed—'twas funny—
I took a walk with an Easter bunny.
He showed me, the Easter bunny did,
Where all the finest eggs were hid.
We had much fun, till I heard nurse say,
"Wake up, wake up! 'Tis Easter day."

Br'er Fox and the Bunny.

Once upon a time there was a hen who, in order to be exclusive of her friends of the barnyard, built her nest up the road in a thicket under the fence and started in to raise a brood of chicks.

Everything worked fine, but one moonlight night there came a sudden stop, for down the road came a fox, nosing from side to side, till all of a sudden he spied in the moonlight in the grass the head of Mother Hen on her eggs. Quick as a flash he grabbed her by the neck and dragged her off the nest, and away up the lane he went. Sooth to say, it looked bad for the eggs in the nest. But up from the barn in the lane came loping along, nosing from side to side, a little brown bunny, when, suddenly he lighted on the vacant nest. Creeping closer, he took in the situation, the warm nest and nobody home. Instead of destroying them the dear little fellow just placed his warm body on the eggs and took the place of the poor mother, keeps them warm all night, and the next morning, which was Easter morn, he brought forth a brood of chicks.

The Egg and Easter.

Many writers assert that the custom of exchanging eggs was borrowed from the Jewish use of eggs during the feast of the Passover.

Others say that it is traceable to the fourth century, when the church prohibited eggs during Lent. This gave an abundance of eggs at Eastertide, some of which parents gave to their children, decorating them to make them more attractive.

In Italy, it is believed that a scarlet Easter egg, carried about the person during the year will bring good luck. The farmers believed that the land over which an egg had been rolled yielded plentiful harvests.

Why Quassia Was So Called.

Quassia, that exceedingly bitter drug so largely used for medicinal purposes, owes its name to a negro named Quassi, a native of Surinam or Dutch Guiana, who brought it into notice as a medicine about the middle of the eighteenth century. It was the wood of the quassia amara, a small branching tree or shrub, all parts of which were very bitter to the taste and which was used for tonics. From Surinam it was introduced into Stockholm in 1756 and in quite a short time became a popular medicine all over Europe. At one time so efficacious was it considered that drinking cups were made of it for the use of invalids suffering from dyspepsia or similar ailments.

Easter Bells and Blossoms.

The sweetest bells of Easter day
Are not the ones that ring out clearly
Their Easter message blithe and gay,
Although, of course, I love these dearly.

But sweeter than their music, steals
A perfume on the sunlit air,
Until undoubtedly one feels
The hyacinth has bells more fair.

Little, tinted, curling bells,
Pink or purple, blue or white;
Beauty such as theirs foretells
Springtime joy and delight.

They say there lived in days of old
A noble youth who was much famed
For his curling locks of gold—
Hyacinthus he was named.

He was changed into the flower
That we hyacinth now call,
By some ancient god of power,
Yet no tears can we let fall.

At the fate of the fair boy,
For the flower's bells proclaim
Easter love and hope and joy,
So give him enduring fame.

EFFORT TO FEED PRZEMYSL VAIN

Sought to Provision Besieged City by Aeroplanes.

SIEGE ESTABLISHES RECORD

Longest in Modern Warfare—Was Most Picturesque and Doubtful Event of War in Eastern Area and Stronghold Was Defended by Austrians With Vigor and Resourcefulness.

PRZEMYSL NOW PERMYSL.

One of the first acts of the Russians after taking possession of the fortress of Przemysl was to change its name to the Russian form—Permysl.

The siege of Przemysl was the longest in modern warfare. It began on Sept. 2, 1914, on the very day that the Russians defeated the Austrians before Lemberg, and, with few intervals of rest, shots had been exchanged with the enemy for 201 days, or for 100 days longer than the siege of Port Arthur in 1904, seventy-one days longer than the siege of Paris in 1870-1 and fifty-one days longer than the siege of Adrianople in 1912-13.

If by siege, however, is meant the investment of the place, that began soon after Sept. 25, when the Austrians evacuated Jaroslau. From that time on, although the Russian line in Galicia was several times pressed northward and eastward of Przemysl, the Russian circle around the fortress was not broken.

From Dec. 15 until Dec. 22 the Russian left wing rested upon the place. From Dec. 25 on the Russian line moved steadily on westward toward Cracow, 135 miles away, and southward through the Carpathian passes. It was driven back again and again, but never released its hold on Przemysl, even though several attempts were made to raise the siege. When on Dec. 25 the advancing line severed its connection with the besiegers for the last time a large covering force estimated at 250,000 men was left strongly intrenched around the city.

Fall Reported Many Times.

The siege was the most picturesque and doubtful event of the war in the eastern area, and the fortress from first to last was defended by the Austrians with vigor and resourcefulness. At the most heated periods of the assault rumors from Petrograd of its fall have succeeded rumors from Vienna of the siege being raised. With the falling back of the Russian army came the rumor that the siege had been abandoned, while sorties, which invariably cost the Russians dearly, were taken to mean that the city had been relieved.

It was believed, however, that the state of the besieged was desperate, for, in the middle of January, the noncombatant paupers were sent out of the city to the Russian lines, and these reported that there was not enough food to last another fortnight, yet the city held out for over two months more.

The only communication with the outside world was by means of a wireless station erected on an elevation known as Casimir hill, above the city, and by an occasional aeroplane flight to and fro between the city and beyond the gradually retreating Austrian armies.

News obtained in this way, in spite of the revelations of the expatriated noncombatants, described the conditions as nearly normal except for the regulations imposed by the military authorities.

All supplies of food had been taken over by the army officials early in January. They issued rations to soldiers and civilians alike. The last direct word from Przemysl before the announcement of its surrender was that the Russian attacks were growing infrequent and that the defenders had little to do. This was on March 12, just before the Russians began their final series of assaults.

Food by Aeroplanes.

At one period of the siege an attempt was made to provision the city by means of aeroplanes making daily trips from Cracow to Przemysl. Then the Russians brought down an aeroplane said to have been laden with canned beef.

The fall of Przemysl was foreseen in a Petrograd dispatch on March 17, which said that the capitulation of the fortress was a matter of a few days. Just previous to this Austrians captured in sorties said that the garrison were living on starvation rations and that the hospitals were crowded. Plague and typhus were also reported to have gained a foothold in the city.

By military experts Przemysl has been described as the key to Budapest and Vienna, but this opinion has in recent years been discounted by the growing [illegible] of Cracow.

Przemysl, which had the siege been raised, could have supplied the Austrians with the badly needed petrol, of which it has a great store and a refining plant, lie on the River San, fifty miles from Lemberg. It had a population of 50,000, mostly [illegible]

The Consolidation of Rural Schools

(Courtesy American City Bureau)

The greatest hope for a general and thorough betterment of rural social conditions lies in the consolidated school. It is no longer an experiment, having been tried for a score of years in Ohio and in all parts of the land. Its full harvest of beneficial results has not been reaped because in both educational and social directions ideals of what ought to be done are just appearing. Enough in these directions has been secured to insure the formation of more competent plans and methods. Some of the benefits are presented.

1. The consolidated school supplies the social clearing house and social center needed in rural communities. We have seen that the school is the only completely democratic, non-sectarian, universal and permanent institution rural regions possess. But the small one-room buildings have incapacitated them to act as social centers. The consolidated school, with its larger building and grounds established for social as well as educational objects, serves as a competent agent. Its social serviceability is seen in the case of the children while in school.

"In the consolidated rural school all children from the entire township or district meet, mingle, compete, strive, make friendships, and learn how to work together. The school is free and accessible to all children within its jurisdiction. All the boys and girls, including those attending high school, return home daily, and, doing their allotted work or chores mornings and evenings, keep in touch with the home, the farm, and all its affairs, and remain within the shelter of home during the most impressionable period of their lives. There is no longer so much occasion for part of the children to attend distant boarding schools or to pay board in the near-by villages to attend high school. Class distinctions, which the old district school unconsciously fostered, are broken down and removed."

In securing an effective play center it is worth its cost. Play cannot be organized with the one-room school. There are not enough children of a given age, and frequently not enough all told, to have a baseball or a football game, or any other which calls for considerable numbers. Small school are stupefying in their lack of opportunity for organized activity.

The advantages to the adults of the community are secured by having commodious and comfortable homes in the consolidated building for their clubs, organizations, and social activities. The Government report on consolidated schools exhibits cuts of various buildingwhich range in price from $5,000 to $20,000, and any of them could be made to afford quarters for community purposes. Some of them are splendid looking buildings architecturally, structures a neighborhood would be proud of. As yet the social feature has not entered largely into the plans and arrangements of such school buildings. The community needs should be met in their arrangement.

2. The educational advantages of consolidation are obvious.

(1) Better grading with its advantages would be secured. Three teachers could take charge if districts were consolidated into schools of one hundred, one having about seventy pupils and the others the upper classes.

(2) There is the stimulus which is obtained from numbers. A moderately large school is more successful than a very small school, by reason of the institutional spirit which it begets and the spirit of competition and rivalry which will exist between classes and between members of the same class. All of this creates a healthy condition which stimulates work and often makes a dull, stupid boy or girl a bright energetic individual.

(3) The school year will be longer. As it is now, some strong districts have a long term and the weak districts have a short term. Under consolidation experience shows that much longer school years are sustained and that the attendance is increased and is more regular.

(4) Consolidated schools afford the rooms, equipment, grounds, distribution of time, and specialization in teaching force which are required to modernize and adjust education to rural needs. Agriculture is taught in conjunction with a small demonstration farm of five or ten acres, which is a part of the school plant. Manual training and domestic science are provided in the basement or other suitable rooms furnished and equipped for those purposes.

(5) Better supervision of schools and more highly qualified teachers are secured.

Supervision is obtained by the daily visit of the principal to the class rooms, whereas the county superintendent sees the district schools but once or twice a year. The latter can make his work more effective in the visitation of sixteen to twenty-five consolidated schools than in one hundred or one hundred and fifty district schools. The principal of the consolidated school relieves the teacher of much of the discipline, making her school work more effective.

(6) Country pupils may have the advantage of high school education, as many consolidated schools sustain from two to four years of high school work. This increases the number of those who avail themselves of high school privileges.

(7) The much needed leadership in rural communities is bred and secured. Pupils who secure an adjusted education right in their home schools will remain at home to use it. The increased high school attendance prepares a larger number of educated men and women to assume the direction of affairs. The teaching force becomes an available asset to the community and colleges give them a social outlook and an understanding of rural neigbborhood problems much in the way of leadership may be expected of this teaching force.

3. There can be little doubt that the consolidated school is the most economical system of rural education. The better social and educational benefits it yields is the guarantee of its value. It should not bep romoted solely on the grounds of financial saving. Where it has been established as a settled part of community life the citizens of the community would resent the imputation that the object of consolidating was cheaper rather than better schools. In many cases consolidation has resulted in an actual financial advantage.

Education in agriculture and household economy should make country men and women much larger producers and conservers. This stimulus to production would far more than offset any increase of expenditure which consolidation entails. Considering its social, educational, leadership, and financial aspects, consolidation of rural schools may safely be pronounced to be the best educational system and to offer the largest prospects as a means of community improvement.

All Play Runs Broken

Poor Jones got in a trance
And ceased from being sporty;
He woke, by some mischance,
In nineteen hundred-forty.
Oh, how the world was changed
In virtue and in flaw!
He thought himself deranged
Until this sign he saw:
"Again today that serial play,
'The Case of Harry Thaw!'"

Said Jones, "Am I advanced
Too greatly in my date,
And was I but entranced
One day from twelve to eight?"
"Oh, no," they said, "you've slept
Years twenty-five away,
And still we've daily kept
Exhibiting our play:
This show appeals in fifty reels—
'The Case of Thaw' today!"

"Pshaw!" said the Rip-like one;
"You're fooling me, I know.
D'ye mean this show has run
Since nineteen-six or so?"
They answered: "Yes, indeed;
We put it on each year,
And people come with speed
Whene'er our signs appear:
We have the film that's sure to thrill 'm—
'The Case of Thaw' is here!"

You talk of "Uncle Tom,"
"Old Homestead" and "East Lynne!"
We take the laurels from
Those dramas old and thin.
"Camille" will be forgot
And no one think of Shaw
When still there's a spot
Wherein this sign will draw:
"Come in and see our comedy—
'The Case of Harry Thaw!'"

WILL SEARCH ARCTIC FOR CREW OF KARLUK.

Steam Trader Belvedere Makes Dash For Polar Regions.

Making a daring dash on a bare chance that eight men of the ill fated Stefansson exploring steamship Karluk, last seen by rescued companions on ice packs in the midarctic, are still alive, the steam trader Belvedere left Seattle to push into the heart of the arctic to Herald island.

This island is believed to be the only possible refuge for the party, that has not been seen or heard from since the loss of the Karluk, a year ago last January.

The Belvedere is in command of Captain A. P. Jochimsen, master of the famous schooner King and Wing on her memorable dash to Wrangel island last year. Upon the story of the eleven survivors found on Wrangel island is based the faint hope that some of the eight missing may still be alive.

With the Karluk crushed between grinding bergs nothing was left for her crew but to strike out over the solid ice for land. Led by Captain Bartlett, one group reached Wrangel island, and Bartlett accomplished the almost superhuman feat of "mushing" from there to the Siberian coast with directions that later brought rescue for those remaining behind.

She will carry a crew of seventeen men. At Petropavlovsk a crew of about twenty-two Eskimo hunters will be shipped. Then the famous old ship will push on up the Siberian coast.

Are the Taxpayers of Fulton Interested in the Resignation of Clinton H. Hulett from the Board of Assessors? A Correspondent Says Some Pertinent Things

RUSSIANS BATTLE WAY TO HEIGHTS DOMINATING MOUNTAIN PASSES

London, April 6.—Enormous Russian reinforcements are arriving daily in the region of Uzsok Pass, where the Tsar's army is slowly but certainly scaling the icy cliffs to the heights dominating the pass. This sector now presents some of the most furious fighting of the war, and, with the Russians on the Hungarian side of the Dukla and Lupkow passes, it is the center of all military interest.

Correspondents and military observers who have returned from the Carpathians say the world has no conception of the enormous difficulties both armies have had to overcome in maintaining themselves in the mountain districts without considering the requirements of continuous and desperate battles. Since early in the winter the fighting for the passes has been incessant. Most of it has occurred at an altitude above four thousand feet. At least one engagement occurred at a height in execess of nine thousand feet. Blizzards, avalanches and zero temperature have added their terrors to the combat, and virtually every charge or assault has been made through snow, into which the men sank to their waists.

Military authorities have given the utmost credit to both armies for the organization that has enabled them to keep battering away, far from bases of supplies where every round of cartridges, every shell, every army biscuit has to be transported by horse and wagon over trails that might at times try the skill of a mountain sheep.

The strain offers to the army engineers inconceivable handicaps. Instances are numerous where a position—the capture of which has cost the lives of hundreds of men—has had to be immediately abandoned because no part of the battle line could be seen from it. While perhaps not three hundred yards from a strong point of support it became valueless because a chasm, a crag, an insurmountable cliff, intervened. And, except in especially well located positions, the value of artillery has been negligible. Almost every foot of ground has been gained or lost at the point of the bayonet where men met men breast to breast and hand to hand. Crawling up ice coated hills or sliding and rolling down snow crusted declivities, the infantry has conducted its charges and overcome what in other circumstances would be called insuperable obstacles.

Of the results of the fighting yesterday's reports show a slow but very steady progress for the Russians. A most obstinate resistance is being offered by the Austro-German armies, and it seems well established that the new German reinforcements, sent toward the front last week, are arriving and taking their positions in the defensive positions.

The Petrograd official report last night mentioned the capture of Cisna, an important station high in the mountains between Lupkow and Uzsok, where they found a large supply of war materials and transports.

The official statement issued during the evening at Vienna says the engagement is continuing with great fierceness on both sides of the Labrosz valley. It mentions the repulse of a Russian attack at Vrava and the capture of 2,020 men and the repulse of Russian counter attacks directed against the eastern Labcroza heights.

The fact that the Russian right is moving from the mouth of Dukla Pass toward Bartfeld, twenty miles to the southwest and the head of a line of railway running south into Hungary, leads the observers here to believe the Russian General Staff is confident of its ability to smash a way all through the mountains. The forces operating in the Dukla sector removed all serious opposition from their front a fortnight ago, but made no move to continue their advance for the reason that they would be in very great danger of a Sedan if their comrades, battering at Lupkow and Uzsok, failed to shatter the defences to those passes and join them on the sunny side of the mountains. Now the advance on Bartfeld has begun, it is regarded as certain that only days will elapse before the long heralded and real invasion of Hungary begins in earnest.

In addition to the menace to the dual monarchy at Bartfeld, Petrograd says fighting is in progress not far from Mezolaborcz, another important railway head. The Russians also mention another success in Bukowina, and the capture of another thousand prisoners, while the Austrians assert they repulsed a Russian force which attempted to cross the Dniester river.

The Russians are making progress in Northern Poland, according to a German official report which tells of the repulse of a Russian attack on Mariampol, considerably west of the region which a few days ago was in the possession of the Germans.

Last week The Evening Times contained a letter signed "Inquirer," in which the writer sought from Mayor Fox certain information. This information has not been produced, and now, once more, the same writer repeats, in an emphatic tone, what he thinks of the silence that appears to be taking the golden hue.

"Inquirer" writes as follows:

Editor Evening Times:

Some days ago I addressed some inquiries to the assessors, requesting a prompt reply through your paper. No reply has been made. Why not? They are public officials and now performing their public duty of preparing the coming assessment roll. The news leaked out that the assessors had recently been asked to meet the Mayor at his office. Mr. Merriam did not attend this meeting. The others, Brennan and Hulett, did attend and there met the Mayor and his City Attorney. The Mayor produced a prepared list of properties around the business sections. He and the City Attorney made certain statements and insisted these properties should be raised 25 per cent. above last year's assessment. A second meeting was held at the Mayor's office, we are told, at which the City Attorney was absent, but Mr. Merriam was present. The 25 per cent. "boost" was again discussed. Following this meeting, Mr. Hulett resigned. Mr. Merriam threatened to resign. Mr. Brennan is quoted in the public press, without denial, as saying that the carrying out of the Mayor's so-called "suggestion" meant the doom of the Republican party, and if he were a Republican, he would resign! We confess we do not understand this Daniel's line of argument, from a civic standpoint. From the politician's pedestal, however, we infer that he intended to remain on the assessing board and help wreck the Republican party and the present administration, in carrying out the Mayor's "suggestion."

The Mayor says the public is not interested in the causes leading up to the Hulett resignation. We think he will soon change his mind. The taxpayers are interested. They propose to know why he "suggested" his horizontal raise of 25 per cent. on certain properties to the exclusion of all others; what was said by him that caused Hulett to resign; and what inducements were held out to Merriam to cause him to remain on the board. We all know Brennan's reason now for holding down his job—thanks to his political frankness.

Now, Mr. Mayor, kindly take your constituents into your confidence, and tell them what sort of medico-political dope you administered to your appointees at those conferences, that caused them immediately to begin to raise assessments of business properties 25 per cent. above last year's figures?

This is taxpayers' business, Mr. Mayor, and they propose to call you and your assessors to the front door for explanations.

INQUIRER.

Justice DeAngelis Withholds Decision in Lighting Case

What may be the final chapter in the Fulton Light, Heat and Power Company-Seneca River Power Co. controversy, into which the Fulton Board of Public Works and other individuals were drawn, took place in Oswego yesterday in the April term of the Supreme Court, Justice DeAngelis presiding. The action was brought by the Seneca Power Company through William Moon of the company to induce the court to issue a permanent injunction against the Board of Public Works and the Fulton Light, Heat and Power Company restraining the company and the Board from fulfilling a contract made on the lighting of the city.

The Niagara interests were represented by Eugene M. White of Phoenix.

Mr. White purposed to show that the Board of Public Works had no legal right to let a contract regardless of specifications to the lowest responsible bidder and the Board and the local company maintain that according to the city charter it is entirely within the power of the Board to do so.

Mr. Spencer of Gannon, Spencer & McBell, represented the Fulton company and Claude E. Guile represented the city. During the morning session, City Attorney Fanning, Leon R. Scudder and William Moon were called by Mr. White. The specifications of the contract were described. Mr. Scudder verified the specifactions as those which had been on file in his office here. In the afternoon F. G. Spencer, J. J. Jordan and L. E. Garrett were called by Mr. Spencer. They also described the specifications and Mr. Jordan submitted the estimates of both companies on the contract. The Fulton company was lower than the Oswego company in every instance.

It was shown that the Fulton company agreed to supply 4 lamps of 80 c.p. at $6.18; 216 lamps of 100 c.p., at $368.99; 172 lamps of 250 c.p., at $404.91, and 40 lamps of 400 c.p., at $128.50. The Oswego company's estimate for the above lamps were $7.66; $414.00; $430.00 and $140.00 respectively. The awarding of the contract to the Fulton company saved the city $83.00 a month in light bills or, as the figures show, some $9969.60 in ten years. The estimated cost of Seneca River company lighting and installation for a period of ten years amounted to $125,000. The Fulton company will do the same work for $109,029.60, saving the city $15,970.40 in ten years.

Justice DeAngelis listened attentively to all the testimony and after both sides had rested he announced that he would take the matter under consideration and hand down a decision in ten days.

German Submarine Sinks Italian Vessel; Crew's Fate Unknown

Genoa, via Paris, April 6.—News was received here today that a German submarine had sunk the Italian steamship Luigi Parodi, which left Baltimore on January 22 with a cargo of coal for Genoa. The report has caused a profound impression here, and there are many expressions of resentment. Great excitement prevails and the authorities have taken strong measures to protect the German colony and German shops from the possible exaction of reprisals. Nothing is known of the fate of the crew of the Luigi Parodi, which was made up entirely of Genoese.

The Luigi Parodi was a steamship of 2,672 tons. She left Baltimore on January 22, her destination being given as Augusta, Sicily. The latest marine records simply report her as "overdue," apparently nothing further having been heard from her.

If the Luigi Parodi was sunk by a German submarine it would seem to indicate that Germany's under water craft are covering a wide field of operations extending far beyond the waters of the British Isles.

BERLIN HEARS OF WAR BETWEEN ORIENTALS

The Hague, via London, April 6.—A report was circulated in Berlin today that war had been declared between China and Japan. Both the Chinese and Japanese Ministers at The Hague deny that there is any truth in the report.

The Chinese government, replying to Count Okuma, the Premier of Japan today, issued a statement reading as follows:

"Chinese official circles are gratified that Count Okuma in Tokio has given expression to his appreciation of the frankness with which the Chinese government is negotiating, and his earnest desire for a speedy conclusion of the negotiations.

"Regarding the real purport of some of the demands to which Count Okuma referred, the Chinese government hitherto has been interpreting them according to the usual meaning of the words employed. Now, however, that Count Okuma has placed an extra-textual interpretation on these demands, the Chinese government feels a little reassured and is confident his statemnt will bar fruit in fact."

The Japanese have not replied to the request of China that Japanese troops on Chinese territory be removed.

Power Boats Pratise 'Safety First'

Thanks to the efforts of the officers and members of the United States Power Boat Squadrons their signal, "Safety First," has now become the slogan on board nearly a thousand power yachts in New York and Eastern waters. This class of motor driven boat, by reason of its phenomenal increase in numbers, size and speed, was fast becoming a menace to navigation. Frequent collisions, sometimes accompanied by loss of life, owing to the crowded condition of our principal harbors and the deplorable lack of even elementary knowledge by boat owners of the rules of navigation, made quick action imperative.

The commodore and other flag officers of the Boston Yacht Club took the initative some fifteen months ago, when they organized what is now known as the United States Power Boat Squadrons, the prime object being the compulsory examination of all power boat owners in the "rules of the road" at sea, and in the proper use of whistle, flag and fog signals and running lights, together with the use of the chart, the compass and the leadline.

Examinations are conducted by a body of competent men approved by the Board of Local Steamboat Inspectors and including one naval officer, with the result that those who pass receive a certificate equivalent to a second class pilot's license and are permitted to fly the ensign adopted by the organization, which is similar to the regular yacht ensign with this exception, that the stripes are blue instead of red.

The parent organization was incorporated in Massachusetts early this year, and there are now ten squadrons in as many harbors and eight more in process of formation. Captain and pilots on board large vessels no longer fear trouble when they see a power boat approaching which is flying a Power Boat Squadrons flag.—N. Y. Tribune.

"New Freedom" at Gary

At the entrance to the steel mill in Gary, near the employment office, is a large vacant lot, comprising enough ground to make a city block or two. It is there those seeking employment stand in line awaiting their turn to enter the office and press their claim for work.

A few days ago the steel mill advertised that on Monday it would open other furnaces and take on extra men. This strip of ground was inadequate to hold the applicants. When the whistle blew at 7 o'clock in the morning, 3,500 men were in waiting, anxious to get a chance to earn enough to buy the necessities of life. They were not all foreigners either, but many of them born and raised in the good old Hoosier State.

This condition is a direct result of the infamous Underwood Toriff law, which makes it possible to import steel rails into Chicago from foreign countries cheaper than they can be made in Gary.

This crowd would have furnished a splendid audience for President Wilson or Secretary Bryan to have addressed, expounding the doctrine of the "New Freedom."—Monticello (Ind.) Herald.

Visions First

Opportunities in South America are not what the romantic adventurer thinks they are. One cannot go there with but two empty hands and grow amazingly rich in a few years. Sustenance is not to be plucked from trees. Gold does not lie glittering in the sands. Wild herds on endless plains are not waiting to belong to such as will but come and brand them. One who seeks the South America of the curious old woodcuts in the last generation's fourth-grade geography will do well to take money along for return passage. Many forget to do so and very soon become stranded in the land of their dreams.

The number of them seems now to be increasing, probably owing to the publicity that has accompanied a sudden access of a genuinely intelligent commercial interest in the future of Pan-American trade. It seems very silly. Anybody of average intelligence ought to know better. And yet the individual who goes empty-handed on the chance of taking fortune unawares differs not so very much from those who have thought in the past that South Americans could be persuaded by diplomacy to buy goods in the United States with credit and capital borrowed in Europe. Merchants and traders will make a great many foolish mistakes, no doubt, in their first experiences with Latin-American markets. It is better that they should make them and learn. That is what every one else has done.

A century ago, when the English traders were obliged by ncessity to seek new outlets and turned to South America, their blunders were preposterous. In one year more goods were exported to South American countries than those countries could possibly consume or pay for in ten. Huge packing cases were left in the weather on the beaches; they were not worth unpacking, though they contained cut glass ware, costly fabrics, Sheffield plate, etc. Among other curiosities was a large consignment of skates abandoned on a semi-tropical shore. Afterwards there was a speculative craze for South American shares in London. It went to smash, and millions of pounds were lost. But all of that was realy an investment in the future of British trade with Latin-American countries. It paid very handsomely in the end. Nothing is done without waste.—New York Times.

INDUSTRIAL EDUCATION

Almost universally in the United States, boys and girls may leave school at 14 years or earlier to go to work. At least 2,000,000 boys and girls in this country between the ages of 14 and 16 are working for wages. They are unskilled at that age and unable to take responsibility. Few occupations open to them offer any training that enables them to develop. They are wasted material, unless it is denied that undeveloped human power is waste.

This does not include the additional army of children in some of the southern States leaving school at the tender age of 12. During the present year at least 1,000,000 more childish wage-earners upon reaching the age of 14 will enter the ranks of industry. More than six out of ten of this multitude did not finish the work of the elementary school. More than three out of four of them did not reach the seventh year of the schools and more than one out of two, the sixth year. Almost half of them had not completed the fifth grade work. Great numbers of them were barely able to meet the test for illiteracy necessary in order to secure working certificates which in most of the States is a test on the work of the Fourth grade.

For millions of people, life has been narrowed and sombered by the fact that the cost of life's necessities has increased more rapidly than their earning power. Their earning power can be increased only by vocational expertness and efficiency and that can only be promoted by education.

The manufacturer and the industry suffer with the workers. The loss in "training on the job" is heavy, and the shifting of the unskilled from shop to shop is constant. The best organized industry cannot prevent this loss if the worker comes to his job unprepared. The commerce of the country suffers as well. In the world markets the competition is keen. Our great natural resources and our inventive and directive ability have put us in the front rank, but they will not keep us there if the present waste goes on. The waste of material resources is great, but the waste of human resources is greater.

The country is awakening to this need, and here and there real industrial training has begun. But as yet it reaches only a handful of the boys and girls thronging into industry, or of the men and women already at work who wish to improve themselves and their condition.

In this whole country, according to the investigations made by the Commission on National Aid to Vocational Education, there are fewer trade schools than exist in the now unfortunate little German kingdom of Bavaria, with a population but little greater than that of New York city. Until the outbreak of the European War more workers were being trained at public expense in the city of Munich than in all the larger cities of the United States put together, although these American cities include a population of 12,000,000.

This is a state of things intolerable in a democratic country. We provide liberally from public funds and private endowments for those who wish to prepare for the professions by long years of schooling. We are failing to give an equal chance to the far greater number of boys and girls who cannot go on after the years of late childhood.

THE MAIN REASON

The Des Moines Register points out that among the causes mentioned for slow business and "disappointment visible in many markets," Bradstreet's places "poor roads" at the top of the list.

Poor roads do constitute an almost insurmountable barrier to good business—it is safe to say they cost the farmers of the Ozark regions alone not less than a cool million annually—but there is still another agency that is mighty potential when it comes to putting the fixin's on business in this country, even if Bradstreet's for discretion's sake is silent on the subject, and that is a national administration which is committed to the always ruinous policy of permitting folks to buy where they can buy the cheapest, regardless of the effect upon wage, factory and trade conditions at home.

We can talk of the revival of business in America until we are purple in the face and our tongues are tired, but business conditions here are not going to be what they were in 1912 and for several years prior thereto until the policy which encourages giving our merchants and manufacturers the bo-by in order to save a few paltry pennies by making our purchases of the merchants and manufacturers in the lower-price countries over seas is done away with.

It has been the invariable rule that both capital and enterprise rule that both capital and enterprise lose heart the instant this country goes to a Free-Trade basis. And when these are dispirited and lethargic wage conditions must suffer.

If the whole country were gridironed on every section line with good roads there would still be something lacking to the making of prosperity in this country so long as we are not safeguarded by a Tariff that really protects.—Springfield (Mo.) Republican.

The Ideal and The Practical

By EDITH V. ROSS

Wickersham was a literary genius, but an undiscovered genius. There are geniuses whose work any one may recognize as something that appeals to him strongly, but he would not stop to ask why. Even such a gift may be a long while in securing recognition, and the chances seem to be largely in favor of its never attaining it. The public is the final judge in such matters, and the public is often slow in making a decision.

When Wickersham first began to write he was told that he must write something original. This was exactly what he was fitted to do, and he did it. He was disappointed in the result. Those who had advised him to produce original matter forgot to remind him that he must educate a clientele to appreciate the novelty. Meanwhile the literary space in the periodicals and other mediums was occupied by the commonplace.

Then Wickersham was told that what publishers wanted was something on a subject which the people were discussing. It was explained to him that advertisement was essential, and a work on such a subject was largely self advertised. So Wickersham chose a theme that was uppermost in the minds of the public and treated it in an original fashion. Again he was disappointed. He could not find a publisher. Why? "My dear fellow," explained an editor, "you lean to one side of the question. Your work will offend every one on the other side." Another said, "You are constantly firing over the heads of the people."

Wickersham was in despair. All his instructions had come to naught.

Then when his failure was complete he had no more sense than to get married. His wife was as pretty as a peach, very practical and had the faculty of making herself liked. When she married Wickersham he had had for months a book on the stands the publication for which he had paid. There was no sale for "The Wanderer," and the copies which were beginning to get soiled were being returned to the publisher.

"I think I will try to do something with that book to get it introduced," said Mrs. Wickersham to her husband.

"Have you read it?"

"Read it? No. It wouldn't do any good for me to read it. What is wanted is to sell it."

Mrs. Wickersham had an intimate friend, Mrs. Singleton, who was at the head of the literary department of a women's club. She took the book to this lady, asked her as a favor to read it and recommend it to her friends. Mrs. Singleton happened to be one calculated to appreciate Wickersham's genius. She did more than recommend the book to her friends; she delivered a lecture on it one afternoon in the clubhouse. Anything Mrs. Singleton said about a book was not disputable among the members of the club.

Presently there sprang up a demand for "The Wanderer." This demand occurred in the city where Mrs. Singleton reigned as literary queen. A few of the women who read it appreciated it, but it mattered not to those who failed to do so, for since Mrs. Singleton had put her stamp on it none of the others would dare condemn it, for they would thereby condemn themselves for lack of appreciation. The calls for "The Wanderer" at the stands increased, and presently a new edition was necessary to supply the demand.

One morning Wickersham woke up to find himself famous. Mrs. Wickersham was famous, too, not only for being the wife of a famous man, but because she was the first to discover his genius, Mrs. Singleton being the second person. Mrs. Wickersham bore her honors modestly. She did not take the trouble to read her husband's book, for she would no more understand it after the public had put its stamp of approval on it than before. There was no necessity for her to read it. When persons congratulated her on her husband's success and her own discernment of his genius she looked modest and said nothing. What is there for a person to say when complimented? Anything said is calculated to do harm rather than good. Mrs. Wickersham stood pat. Among the many persons who congratulated her there was not one who knew that she had never read a word of her husband's book.

Mrs. Wickersham got out all her husband's unpublished manuscripts and offered them to publishers. They were snapped up greedily. A taste for Wickersham's work was gradually growing upon the public, and the sale of his books increased proportionately. Meanwhile he wrote a new one and one day informed his wife that he had given it to a publisher for publication.

"At what royalty?" asked the lady.

"Royalty? I don't know. I suppose the usual royalty."

"Albert," his wife exclaimed, "you are the stupidest man in America!"

Then she visited the publisher in question and returned with a contract to pay her husband double the usual royalty.

Wickersham remained famous for a time. Then his fame began to wane. Some said he had written himself out. Others declared that it had been a mistake to consider him a genius at all. This doesn't matter to his wife, since she is cutting the coupons off the bonds she bought with the money reaped when her husband was a star, and it makes no difference to her now that his star has set.

THE MISCHIEF MAKER

IN EVERY small town there is a character commonly known as the "village cutup," also a certain contingent which "hangs around" grocery stores, unhitches customers' horses driven to town, beats the freight train to the next town and turns the cows into Uncle Reuben's cornfied.

The idea is to make trouble for those who are interested in developing and improving the town. These facts are familiar to every individual who has lived in a small country town, and it may be well to add here, that every small town, as well as the entire world, is divided into two grand divisions: Peace Makers and Trouble Makers—in other words, the Builders and the Dynamiters.

Until about a century ago most everybody belonged to the Trouble Makers, and it was the business of the world to train men to chop off heads and to cry "scab" at every man who stood and worked for a principle. At last, after having tried everything else, we found that co-operation is the first step toward progress. The world has had all the opposition, all the wrangling and all the back-fence gossip it can stand. What we want is peace, work, co-operation, to learn how to economize our work and energy.

With these thoughts we approach the "Mischief Maker" of our modern business—the Price Cutter. Emerson is supposed to have said, "that the man who retires to the forest to make a better axe, or a better plow, or a better hat than man has yet made, will find a beaten path to his door so that his products may be marketed to the world." Emerson did not say this, however, of the man who enters business to cut the price or the legitimate profit out of the merchandise which other men have spent their lives and energy to produce.

The particular point we make here is, that it requires no experience, no intelligence, no ability to cut prices. A great business man has said, "we deal with our friends—our enemies will not trade with us." So, you see, business is founded largely on confidence—and confidence is certainly not founded on price cutting. It may require ten years to advertise an article, to build up its market, to establish its price, yet this price can be cut in a single moment by someone or by anyone who has had no experience and who knows absolutely nothing about the higher and better methods of selling merchandise.

The truth is—price cutting tends toward dissolution, disintegration, dissatisfaction, dissatisfied customers—and you know the prefix "dis" means disease and these things just mentioned are all forms of disease. In other words, price cutting brings about a diseased condition of business. If you are in doubt about the truth of this statement, simply go into any town where there is a price cutting war in process and you will gather some valuable information that will assist you to know what not to do in conducting business.

The salesman who cannot present facts, merit, quality, and the fine points of an article, can always cut the price. The salesman who can present facts, merit, quality, and who understands a certain article of merchandise, will not cut the price, and for this reason this man is a salesman, because he sells goods on the basis upon which they should be sold. Shaving the price is the argument of the weak, the incompetent, the indifferent, and the incapable. Price cutting does not and cannot establish the reputation of an article, and price cutting has not established the reputation of the great merchants and manufacturing concerns of the world who have assisted in improving and developing our ideas and standards of business.

There is no question that certain reductions should be made, to eliminate outworn, dead stock. This is a necessary part of every business, as it cleans up the store, keeps the stock in good shape, and makes for general efficiency. Concerns which stand on quality, which understand the finer and higher ideas and methods of business, do not go into bankruptcy. It is the price cutter, because his trade is superficial, his methods are negative, and there is nothing substantial or fundamental back of his trade. The price cutter makes trouble for his competitors and sends business to the next town.

ADDRESS OF F. M. HUGO

Temporary President, Constitutional Convention

In the mind of every intelligent person the question must sometimes arise, whether the political institutions of his State, and especially its Constitution, are superior to those of other states. The citizen of the Empire State who directs his attention to the Constitution of his own Commonwealth is not likely to regard this question as one upon which there can well be a difference of opinion. The establishing of government here through the adoption of a fundamental law, whether we regard it in the light of its undoubted benefits to the people immediately concerned, or consider its more remote influence upon the institutions of other states, was an act of organization with which for value and importance, no other in this country is comparable.

New York was one of the first to create the American State and now in the number and intelligence of its people, in its resources and power, it takes the unchallenged place as the foremost state of the Union. History reveals no other story of expansion so rapid, of progress so steady, of growth so assuring. Many causes have contributed to this marvelous development and to the general prosperity and order which have accompanied it, but chief among them have been the establishment, through patriotic statesmanship, of efficient and stable representative institutions in the adoption of its Constitution.

But the present organic law is not a perfect instrument, no such instrument of government ever was, for people cannot remain in a stationary condition, but must develop from age to age and this not less in what pertains to government must, therefore, be assured to be capable of improvement and, as it exists at any period of time, it will to some extent be experimental and the expression of a compromise of conflicting or at least of inharmonious views.

The twentieth century has been so far one of marvelous progress which has nowhere been more marked than in this State, but the wisest and best statesman of former times would not have advocated exactly the same government, such as is now established for the reason that the time had not come when such chances would be accepted and supported. Moreover, the wise statesman will not outrun the people in governmental changes; he must keep them abreast with him if apparent reforms are to be reforms in reality.

But even our Constitution, as we now admit, is far from being perfect. Indeed, if we insist upon perfect laws and will have no others, we shall never have any at all. Therefore, in government, wem ust not only strive for what is best, but must be content to put up with something less than perfection. However, the higher the civilization of any people, the more extensive will be the recognition of inherent and indefeasible rights; and, as these can have substantial value only when the laws protect them, our institutions may be expected to expand with social and industrial progress.

This is the natural method of Constitution building. None otherwise formed can so completely adapt itself to the needs and thoughts of the people as the one that sprints directly from the life of the state has been shaped by the events of its history and constitutes an expression of the popular idea of government, and of what arei ts proper functions and limitations. Such a Constitution is only won slowly and it is not unreasonable to assume that nothing could be better or safer than such a growth.

As change in government, therefore, is according to the order of nature, our Constitution provides for safe growth and expansion, and prepares the way by steps which give security against public disorder or violence. Thus, its provisions may be moulded to new thoughts and new deeds as peacefully as the simplest laws on the statute books may be modified, perhaps with as little discussion. Whoever needs proof of the excellence of this method of constitutional development has but to note that the amendments and revision added to the New York State Constitution during the past 138 years of its existence have been carefully and deliberately made under the agreed forms.

Moreover, progress is assured through the conservative features of such a Constitution in harmony with which the progressive spirit of the people acts and moves. In the fact that our Constitution, though at any time binding inflexibly, is nevertheless subject to safe amendment and revision, is to be found our security for what we have and the possibility of anything better for which time and experience mal demonstrate the need. But this provision was intentionally made conservative. The governor cannot change it, the legislature cannot change it, the pople themselves cannot change it hastily under the influence of temporary passions and excitements.

The process is meant to be safe, but to render it so, it is necescarily made slow and deliberate. And such it ought to be. The present constitution emanated from the will of the people; it expressed the best thought of the day: it was agreed upon and put in force because it was found to be excellent. Aud surely in changing things excellent in government no maxim of statesmanship can be wiser than to make haste slowly. The Constitution stands before the people as an emblem of strength and stability and it creates in them a conservative habit of thought, and of action which of itself is invaluable.

Of all the Constitutions which a people make for itself, the best is that which is written with a close hold on the past, but which with foreseeing eyes prepares the way for appropriating the lessons of a progressive future. Only such a Constitution can embody the essential excellencies and can so far harmonize the conservative and progressive principles that the one becomes the complement of the other, in steadily but cautiously and safely moulding the instrument to greater perfection.

BATTLING NELSON TO BOX IN HAVANA RING

Nelson's "Come Back" Described as Wonderful

By Frank G. Menke

Battling Nelson will win from Freddie Welsh if the two men meet in that proposed 45-round bout in Havana in May. That is the opinion of every fight critic who saw Nelson in his amazing comeback performance in Havana last week when he scored a clean-cut victory over Jimmy Fryer, a Philadelphia welterweight, after 25 rounds of furious fighting.

Nelson stopped about 100 of Fryer's punches—but he never stopped coming back for more. He started his famous rushing tactics when the first gong sounded and he never quit until the final gong rang. In the last six rounds he seemed to be stronger than ever although Fryer had cut his lip, smashed his ear and blackened his eyes.

Nelson's Stamina

Nelson's stamina was nothing short of marvelous. The Durable Dane never stopped moving—and he never let Fryer stay in the center of the ring for 10 seconds at a time. He rushed Fryer and rushed and rushed. Fryer was against the ropes at least 50 times during that fight. Three or four times Nelson either knocked or shoved him through the ropes.

Nelson showed the lack of training through his poor judge of distance. At least a half dozen times he made vicious swings that went wide of the mark, but the distance judgment that the Dane had as an asset in his palmiest days can be recovered easily by a few weeks of training.

A Peculiar Incident.

A peculiar incident turned up in connection with that Nelson-Fryer fight. The referee was Sam ("Kid") Lewis, one of the worst burlesques on a referee that ever walked within the ropes.

The fight was a clean-cut Nelson victory because the Dane had been aggressive throughout and because he won at least 18 of the 25 rounds by a wide margin, but to the amazement of everyone in the arena Lewis grabbed the hands of both fighters after the final gong rang and held them up—a signal that means a draw.

A groan went up from the crowd—and then a howl. Lewis jumped from the ring and approached a body of American newspaper men who just at that moment were dazedly discussing Lewis's decision. Lewis overheard what the newspaper men had to say about the verdict and then rushed through the departing crowd, jumped into the ring and at the top of his voice shouted:

"Ladies and gentlemen, this fight wasn't any draw. Battling Nelson won the decision. I award the decision to Battling Nelson."

Later Lewis tried to explain away his change of mind by saying that he did not lift Fryer's hand—that he lifted only Nelson's, but that Fryer had stood alongside and raised his hand back of Lewis's shoulder so as to give the impression that the fight was a draw.

Farmers May Have Their Inning When Next Session Comes

Washington, April 5.—In the legislative hurly-burly which marked the closing hours of the Sixty-third Congress the farmers of the United States, although ably represented in both houses by members who fought to the lat ditch for rural credits legislation, found upon adjournment that they had been completely overlooked. However, members who still are in Washington are predicting that at the next session a concerted attempt will be made not only to have some sort of farm loan system placed on the statutes, but a national marketing system as well.

It is pointed out that the two propositions go hand in hand, inasmuch as the successs of the farm loans system depends largely upon the farmer's success of the farm loans system depends largely upon the farmer's success in marketing his crop.

Many of the members are even new inclined to criticize Congress for failure to enact both of these laws before adjournment and Representative Goodwin of Arkansas, who has offered resolutions providing for a marketing system, says:

"Of the two questions, important as they are, men who have spent years collecting data upon these subjects believe that a system of marketing should be established first, although I believe they should have come simultaneously. For every borrower, there must be a lender, and no lender of money will begin to put his cash out at interest unless he deems the security inviting and the borrower solvnt and liable upon his contracts.

"In other words, if the farmer can dispose of his surplus products at a good advantage and at the profit which is due him instead of losing money through products which for the lack of outlet rot in his bins, he is then in a condition to receive accommodation and to discharge his obligations as the same may fall due from time to time in the way of partial payments on long time loans, such as a rural credits system would make possible.

"An outlet for surplus products, which until this time have been a dead loss to the farmer can be found through a national marketing system. The system should correlate the township, county, State with the entire country. These factors should be so dovetailed and interlinked that there would be no excuse for a farmer failing to find the market which exists for the products which he has available.

"Reports should be exchanged all through the system from day to day by telephone or telegraph as to what products different sections had to offer, and also upon what markets offered for different products."

Many resolutions looking to the establishment of a national marketing system have already been introduced in Congress, together with communications from farmers associations and similar bodies, endorsing the idea, and many attempts were made in this House to have such a provision tacked on the Agricultural Appropriation Bill as a rider, in the same manner in which the McCumber rural credits measure was attached, before the House stripped it of all potentiality.

The Goodwin resolution is among the measures still pending, and it has received the support of David Lubin of California, who is the father of the International Institute of Agriculture of Rome, and wose imprint appears on the proposed Goodwin legislation.

The resolution recites that defects exist in the economic system of the United States which have been accentuatd by the European war and which have to do with prevalent prohibitive prices. These defectsfi it is declared can be dealt with only through semi-governmental agencies, and their eradication will do much toward abolishing the trusts. The national marketing system, as proposed in this resolution, will be under the supervision of a national marketing commission, to be composed of 18 members, 12 of whom shall be engaged in agricultural pursuits. The remaining members to be selected with special reference to their knowledge of finance, transportation, law and commerce.

The commission is to be appointed by the President, and is to meet in the city of Washington at a time to be designated by the President for the purpose of organizing the marketing system, the establishment of which is the object of the resolution.

CLUB HEARD TRADE TALK

South. America's Resources Were Discussed at the Regular Meeting of R. T. Club

Our opportunities for trade with South America, was the topic chosen yesterday by the Rev. H. D. Holmes in his talk before the Rotavued Thirt Club. His remarks summed up the following points:

There are times when we should be interested in the study of Republics to the south of us, because they are days of unprecendented opportunity in Latin America for the commercial and financial interest of this country.

In considerin gthe trade possibilities of South America two facts are evident:

1. The continent presents vast range of thrifty population and of undeveloped land. All this is on the eve of a great era of exploitation.

2. They must buy the greater part of their manufactured articles from North America or Europe. The keynote of the national life of the entire country is development.

South America is of interest geographically. There are twenty separate countries in Central and South America, ranging in size from Salvador, smaller than Vermount with less than 8,000 square miles, to Brazil, larger than the United States with Great Britain thrown in with her 3,200,000 square miles of territory. In all of South America there are 9,000,000 square miles, or three times that o fthe United States.

South America has higher mountains, longer rivers, and fetile valleys and a more varied climate than United States.

It has a population of 75,000,000 with Costa Rica and her population of 400,000 to Brasil with 20,000,000.

When the new immigration starts after the European war is over with the Panama canal in operationfor the use of the shipping their population may soon in point of numbers overtake ours.

All this opens up the question of our opportunity for trade with these people. The size of their import and export for the past year is proof that it is worth considering, because they did business to the amount of $3,000,000,000 with the world. Argentina for example, with about 9,000,000 of people conducted a foreign trade of $900,000,000. This is proof again that they are an ambitious, vigorous and a prosperous people.

The United States it is true had a share of this trade, but a greater part of it mas varried by boats that were flying other flags than the Stars and Stripes, and nearly all of it carried by the way of Europe. We need a merchant marine as well as a mightier navy.

Today is our chance at the markets of South Americas. If we can supply what South Americas needs and in reutrn use the raw products that have been going to Europe it will be a boon for this country.

We have but a faint conception of the yet untouched resources of this mighty country. Her great wealth, vast mineral deposits, vast expanse of grassy plains, rich farming lands, abundant water power—all these need three factors before thet can be developed — capital, transportation, workingmen.

At the outbreak of the war 95 per cent. of her loans were negotiated in Europe. Now the situation has changed Europe will need all her money at home. A splendid opportunity for American to aid in the building of railroads, electric lines, developing water power, aid in her mining and timber operations And to carry on this sort of trade in boats flying our own flag.

John Barrett says: "There should be a closer coming together of men of intellectural leadership of all the American nations and people. There should be migration of the educators, scholars, scientist and students of the United States, not to teach and lead, but to learn and co-operate."

PROCEEDINGS OF BOARD MEETING

Public Works Board Discussed Street Lighting and Sewer Questions

Street lighting in different sections of the city and the storm sewer question were the main topics of discussion at the meeting of the Board of Public Works last night. President Stevenson and Messrs. Wiltsie, Garrett, Mayor Fox and City Clerk Scudder weref resent.

A committee of citizens from the Riverview Park district on the West Side appeared before the board and requested street lights in that section. The spokesman of the delegation stated that there are five houses in that district now, and all the owners are paying taxes almost equivalent to those paid by owners further in town. He requested that the board take immediate action toward street light in that district and said that the Fulton Light, Heat and Power company was ready at any time to install the lights if the city would permit it.

Chairman Stevenson stated that the street in question had not yet been accepted by the city, and therefore the city had no legal right to install any lights there. He cited a former case where water supply was desired in a section which had not been accepted and the city was compelled to refuse the request inasmuch as City Attorney Fanning advised the board that it had no legal right to install lights in unaccepted streets.

After a long discussion during which Mayor Fox urged the board to give the request of the delegation its fullest consideration, President Steyenson told the committee to return next Monday night and in the meantime the board will see what can be done.

A humorous touch was added to the proceedings by a citizen who appeared and wanted to know why it was that he had not been hired oftener on the street work when some of his friends who paid no taxes were continually at work. He stated his case in very forceful terms and demanded that he be given a job right away. It was explained that the board had no authority in the matter and he was referred to Street Commissioner Rumsey.

City Engineer Hill then brought up the question of the storm sewer. Work has already been begun on the sewer and although the Hunter company has not announced yet whether or not it will permit the city to run the sewer into its raceway, it was intimated last night that the city's request will be refused, as the Hunter company thinks the entrance of the sewer would affect its water power. Mr. Hill outlined the course the sewer will have to take should the Hunter company refuse to let the sewer enter its tail-race. Instead of crossing at a point below Ontario st., by the new plan the sewer will cross at Ontario st. then up the west side of the old canal to Hubbard street and down Hubbard st. to a small alley, where the line will take a turn back toward town entering the Hunter race at the street crossin. In the opinion of the City Attorney the city has a right to enter the sewer at any street crossing. At the projected point, however, the Hunter people have an intake for their fire apparatus and inasmuch as the company's officials objected to the former plan for the reason that they thought the sediment from the sewer might lodge in the intake pipe, it is expected that they will object even more strenuously to the pew plan, as it will bring the outlet of the sewer directly opposite the fire intake.

Before the board adjourned three bills for lighting were presented, dating back as far as August 15. In the opinion of the chairman, the bills have already been paid, but an investigation will be made to ascertain that fact. One owner made a request for a sidewalk in his section and he was informed that the board had no money at present with which to start th work; President Stevenson stating that there were 500 requests for sidewalks which have been tabled owing to a lack of funds.

Fire sale on all this week at McKinstry Store. Big reductions on all our stock.

OCAL KNIGHTS NTERTAIN WELL

Last Night's Affair a Splendid Success. Good Music, Beautiful Gowns

An Easter ball, which will be remembered as one of the most successful social affairs in the annals of the order, was given last night by the Knights of Columbus in their auditorium in Oneida st. From 9 o'clock until the wee small hours, the knights and their ladies tripped the light fantastic. Buell furnished the music and it left nothing to be desired. There were dances for everybody, the later innovations for the younger set—two steps and waltzes for those who were not acquainted with the newer dances; and lanciers and reels for those who like a good old-fashioned square dance occasionaly.

The early part of the evening was spent at cards—euchre and five-hundred predominating. Later the floor was thronged with dancers for each number. The refreshments, which were served about midnight, consisted of a dainty fruit salad, sandwiches, mixed cakes and coffee. A committee of knights did the serving and everyone was well taken care of.

The latest notes in the season's prevailing fashions were noticeable in the ballroom; the gowns being very beautiful, both in color and design.

The success of the affair is due directly to the committee on arrangements comprising Messrs. James K. Carroll, chairman; Frederic Kavanagh, Thomas McCullum, John T. Frawley and George M. Moore. John Ward decorated the hall in a very tasteful manner, red, white and blue being the predominant colors. The pleasant evening and the hospitality and courtesy of the knights in charge was remarked by many present and the social affairs of the local lodge will be looked forward to in the future.

NEW OPINION ON ALIEN LABOR LAW

Contractors Need not Dispense With Alien Help Hired When Citizen Labor is Not Available

Albany, April 6.—New York city subway contractors and others engaged in public construction work are not required to dispense with the services of alien laborers hired when citizen labor is not available, although citizen labor becomes available, later, according to an opinion rendered by Attorney General Egburt E. Woodbury to the State Labor Department.

The same opinion holds that where aliens were hired in violation of the labor law as it existed before its amendment this year, their employment should be discontinued, unless citizens are not available. If citizens are not available the employment of aliens may be continued under new contracts of hiring.

The opinion is designed to cover difficulties encountered by New York City subway contractors after the amendment of the alien labor exclusion clause of the labor law. The State commissioner of labor recently advised the Attorney General that some of the contractors contended that it was not necessary to discharge the aliens at present employed, even though citizen labor may obtained. This contention was based upon the modification by the Legislature of the absolute prohibiting of alien labor on public works to the expression that citizens should be given the preference to employment on public works, and permitting the employment of aliens when citizen labor is not available.

"There should be little difficulty," says the opinion of Attorney General Woodbury, "with the question of continuance in employment of aliens employed in conformity with the amendment sincce the time it became effective. The preference given to citizens is intended to be available of at the time the employment is open. If an alien is accepted, because citizens are not available, his employment may continue, although at a later time a citizen might present himself for the particular employment performed by the alien. The statute nowhere indicates that aliens are to be hired simply as temporarf help or stop gaps. It is true that the statute provides that aliens may be employed when citizens are not available.' but this does not carry the implication that aliens must be discharged if at any future time citizens become available. It is unnecessary to enlarge upon the difficulties, hardships and confusion that would result from such an implication."

Concerning the continuance of aliens who were illegally employed before the amendment of the labor law, Attorney General Woodbury holds:

"The question of the continuance of such aliens as were originally employed in disregard of the prohibition of the former law is somewhaht more difficult. Their employment was illegal at its inception. The amendment has not sanctioned it; for we may assume, under the form of the inquiry, that those aliens were employed first, not only in utter defiance of the existing statute, but without any regard for the availability of citizens at the time. When this amendment took effect on March 11 their employment was not legalized. Citizens were allowed to assert their preferenc to the exclusion of the aliens unlawfully employed. The provision of the law bringing existent contracts into conformity with the amendment does not effect this conclusion since the original hiring did not comply with the requirements of either the new law or of the former law. The continuance of such aliens in employment might, however, be legalized under new contracts of hiring, provided that at such time citizens were not available."

Good and Bad Street Trees

Beacuse this is the time when orders are being placed with nurserymen for street trees to be used in the towns and villages throughout the state, Professor R. W. Curtis of the landscape art department of the New York state college of agriculture has issued a list of desirable and undesirable trees.

He suggests that if any of the bad trees have been ordered, some of the good ones should be substituted for them, and that it would pay to write to the nurserymen to change the order at once in case bad ones have been selected. His lists and comments follow:

BAD STREET TREES

Professor Curtis points out that there are two classes of trees which are worthless on the street, those which are rapid growers and those which are individually conspicuous.

Under the rapid growers he includes weak-wooded and short-lived streets such as poplars, soft maple (sometimes known as silver or white maple), box elder or ash-leaved maple, syeamore maple, willows, birches, catalpa, European ash, and ailanthus. None of these, he said. should go on any city street with the possible exception of one. This exception is ailanthus, or tree of heaven. In the dry tenement sections of large cities, where pratically everything is pavement, the ailanthus may be used, but only because it is able to flourish under these harsh conditions. It is short-lived, will break in storms, and become unsightly and dangerous as it grows old.

Carolina poplars and soft maples, he says, are planted altogether too much. He points out that it is against the law to plant these two trees on the streets of several cities, both east and west, as in Cleveland and Minneapolis. In the city of Washington, noted for its street trees, these kinds are being cut down and others planted in their stead. While they are rapid growers they are weak, break easily in the wind, heave up pavements because their roots are near the surface; the roots also get into the sewer pipes.

The box elder is a tree planted largely because it is advertised by nurserymen who find it easy to grow. In New York it is generally a small straggling tree, weak and short-lived. It may be good for holding sliding banks, because it grows and spreads rapidly, but it is useless on the street.

CONSPICUOUS TREES UNDESIRABLE

Among the conspicuous trees those which have flowers and fruits which would invite injury through vandalism are undesirable. Such trees are horse chestnut, catalpa, flowering dogwood, magnolia, mountain ash, hickory and chestnut.

In addition to inviting injury from those who seek its flowers or fruits, the horse chestnut, as a street tree, suffers from lack of water and very seldom survives the summer in sightly condition. The catalpa is weak, has conspicuous flowers, and in addition has large tender leaves which collect dust and become torn and ragged in storms. The locust is badly riddled by borers, and should not be planted for the same reason that chestnut is not planted, that is, that it is likely to succumb to disease.

GOOD STREET TREES

For streets from 60 to 90 feet between buildings, pin oak, oriental plane or sycamore, and Norway maple are said to be desirable. The Norway maple is tough and hardy, has few insect enemies, but has the disadvantage of being broad and low-headed so that it does not allow of the passage of wires where overhead wires are in use. In order to provide ample growing space the trees should be planted 40 feet apart. For wide streets where there is more than 90 feet betwen buildings the American elm, red oak, and sugar maple are advocated. For these trees the space should be not less than 50 feet between trees and where possible they should be planted well inside of the curb line.

The sugar maple is particularly attractive and desirable, but it needs a good deal of moisture. Pin oak is excellent for both narrow and average streets, and is also desirable as individual specimens for the lawn. Contrary to general opinion in regard to oaks, it is a fairly rapid grower and it shares this quality with red oak.

American elm is said to be the handsomest and most satisfactory shade tree in this country, mainly because of its high arching branches which shade but do not smother, allowing free passage of air beneath the tree itself. Some objection has been made to the elm tree because of th deprdations of the elm-leaf beetle, and other insect pests, but this can be readily overcome. In other words, the authorities of the college of agriculture say that the farmer might as readily refuse to raise potatoes because of potato bugs, or decide against planting an orchard because of San Jose scale. The various enemies of the elm tree are easily overcome. One high power sprayer is sufficient to give all the elms in an average sized city or town a good spraying, promptly and efficiently, at a cost not to exceed 20 cents a tree. This high power sprayer has an engine with a special pump which can furnish 300 pounds pressure continuously. Such a sprayer can shoot over any tree grown in the east, and no ladders are necessary. The stream of spray breaks into a mist at about 50 or 60 feet from the bround when a straight-bore nozzle with a one-igluth-inch opening, is used or from 90 to 100 feet with a larger opening. In a small town such a high power sprayer could be used for fire protection, or if the engine could be detached from the pump and used for other power purposes.

CO-OPERATION ESSENTIAL

In all street tree work it is pointed out that co-operation with one's neighbors is essential, especially where the trees are not cared for under direct municipal supervision. A street planted uniformly to one good kind of tree is much better than one planted to three or four kinds, and the trees on both sides of the streets should be alike. It is advocated that all towns should have a shade tree commission or at least a tree warden with power to secure co-operation with all the city's interests, or that the town itself should plant and care for the trees.

Speech of William Barnes to Albany Chamber of Commerce

"Mr. President and other members of the Chamber of Commerce of the City of Albany:

"In accepting the invitation to speak at your luncheon today, coming as it does just at this time, on the eve of the assembling of the constitutional convention, I assume that you expect me to say something regarding my views as one of the delegates from this sensatorial district as to what that convention should do.

"It would be idle for me to enter into detail on this subject. The work of such a body must of necessity develop out of the progress of its debates and projection of ideas, but that it will emerge surely at the end of the road with more clarity and forbearance than will probably be disclosed at the beginning of the journey, may be expected.

"However, it is entireely pertiment for me to speak on what seem to me to be essentials:

"The constitutional convention ought to take steps to make clear to the voters of the state what their function will be in November in relation to the work of the convention. The convention only recommends. The voters make the establishment. It is for them, therefore, to comprehend that, on the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November, they will exercise their greatest sovereign privilege—the establishing of the basic law of thec ommonwealth of the state of New York to which they owe allegiance.

"They should [illegible] to vote intelligently, with discrimination, and with the knowledge that in so voting they are exercising a function possessed by the voters in, practically, no other country on earth. It is the duty of the convention to disseminate this truth.

"The constitution of the state of New York is the people-made law, adopted by them directly, and not, as constitutions arem ade in the great nations of Europe, indirectly by legislative bodies.

Amend Constitution

"The Legislature of the state of New York, comprised of representatives of the people, is a body created by and subordinate to the people-made law known as the constitution. The legislative bodies of Great Britain and France and Germany are not subject to any people-made law, but establish and amend the constitutions of those countries at will, by what would be termed in America mere legislative enactment. Therefore the voters of this state should recognize that in voting upon the state constitution, they are exercising a function involving their real sovereignty; that they are making basic law to which all the representatives whom they may choose in the future must conform. They should understand that this function which they possess is unique — unknown, practically, beyond the borders of the United States.

"Because of failure to comprehend this vital difference in form or organized American society from that of other nations there was a possible confusion existing in the minds of the voters a short time ago, when it was attempted to establish, by constitutional amendment, the powed in the voters to recall a decision of the courts upholding the constitution of the state or nation against a legislative act which violated it.

"There was no endeavor to break down the American institution of a constitution made by the direct act of the voters, thereby placing the power of constitution-making in the legislative bodiees, but to create a power in a principle by their own act, to deny the voters, once they had established to do so in a specific case.

"For example: The constitution of the state of New York adopted by the people in 1894, provides that the Legislature cannot confiscate the property of any person. Had the proposed amendment to the constitution of this state for the recall of judicial decisions been established, then if the Legislature deprived any person of hhis property and the aggrieved person, citizen or alien, appealed to the courts and was sustained, then the decision of the court could have been reversed by the act of the voters in this specific case. In the event that the voters so reversed that decision, then the covenant made by the people with each one of its residents, that they would not take his property by legislative act, would become 'a scray of paper.'

Injustice Possible

"Each person, therefore, if such procedure were established, could be sure his property only in the event that he was popular enough to obtain a majority of th ballots.

"Probably not one per cent of the people of this state, acting in their sovereign capacity in voting a constitution, would be willing to provide in it that the Legislature might take the property of any person without compensation; yet if a proposal was presented to them to take the property of some unpopular or discredited person, the outcome would be doubtful. The injustice is clear.

"I refer to this particular nostrum because of the currenc which it secured, due, to my mind, largely to the lack of appreciation on the part of the voters that the constitution is their law. The legislative law is made by their representatives, and may or may not be their law because it cannot exist except through their consent.

"The new constitution, therefore, should provide, as does the present, for an establishment covenant made by the people of this state one with rights as individual citizens and their privilege as aliens cannot be assailed by the legislative power, and that, if so assailed, there shall be courts of justice before which the legislative power may be arraigned and the people-made law of the constitution upheld against the acts of those representatives who have spurned the constitution of the state made by its people in violation of their oath of office.

"The inadequacy of the recall of judicial decisions, regardless of the injustice inherent in it, ought to appeal to the mind of every voter. Its excuse was that American constitutions were antiquated; that there ought to be a short-cut to accomplish certain things. That short-cuts exist in Great Britain and in France. In Great Britain, the mere act of Parliament is constitutional law; In France the written constitution may be amended by action of the National Assembly, so that, practically, the National Assembly of that country can make a constitution over again at will, to meet any emergency.

"In America, however, we are differently organized. In the states of the Union, the people make the basic law, known as the constitution, and the legislatures are held within the limits prescribed by that people-made law.

"The establishment of this plan as against the European plan, like all events of history resulted from conditions. In Europe the legislative bodies grew in influence as bulwarks as against the monarchical power. There never has been people-made law there. InI America the people-mad law was established for the purpose of preventing the government chosen by the people, and sitting in the shoes of the European monarchs, from violating the expressed will of the people on certain fundamental lines described in the American Declaration of Independence as 'life, liberty and pursuit of happiness.'

More Power

"It is within the power of the constitutional convention to recommend to the voters that they grant to the Legislature of this state all the powers possessed by the Parliament of Great Britain, except in so far as they might conflict with the constitution of the Federal Union. It is also within the power of the convention to recommend to the voters of the state limitations upon the legislative power, asking them to express their will directly on fundamental questions.

"We therefore come, in logical sequence, to the most important matter with which this convention will have to deal:—The extension, or the limitation of legislative power.

"I assume that the convention will not favor an extension of legislative power. I do not believe this is its temper, nor do I believe that if it were its temper such temper would hold against the protest of public opinion which would be aroused in opposition to such extension, if such recommendation seemed imminent.

"I favor greater limitation upon the legislative power than exists at the present time. I believe that, to the derstood, the people will see the manifest importance of greater curtailment of that power; leaving to the process of constitutional amendment by the voters themselves, such new establishment of doctrine as they desire by majority vote of the whole electorate.

"I will be charged, in this statement, with favoring direct legislation. I do favor direct action, whenever the subject is general and not specific. But the 'legislation' should not be what we know as legislation, but should be constitutional law, the establishment of a principle by the people as to what their government may or may not do.

Favors Directness

"The constitution of the state, prior to the year 1913, provided that property could not be taken without due process of law. It was amended, at that time, by a vote of 500,000 to 200,000, that in the case of an employe injured through his own fault and through no fault of his employer, he could be compensated for his loss, and that, in such a specific case, the property of the employer could be taken without due process of law.

"Thns the voters of the state have already established a privileged class, on the theory that in occupations in themselves hazardous, the cost of living must bear the burden of a man's own fault because in many cases it is impossible to determine whether it is his fault or not.

"Thus the people of the state have already established one exception to the general rule that a man's property cannot be taker by the Legislature.

"It is inconceivable that the people of this state should give power to the Legislature in general terms to take away property from citizens of this state by legislative enactment, and yet, by a vote of five to two, they voted that it should be so taken away in the case of an injured employe.

SCOTT TELLS OF INDIANS' ARREST

HIS INFLUENCE WONDERFUL

Outlaws Treated as Wild Horses, Which False or Sudden Move Would Stampede Out of Sight—Renegades Accompany General Freely Without Handcuffs or Guards.

Accompanied by Lieutenant Colonel R. E. L. Michie of the general staff and Paul Randolph, my orderly, I left Washington on March 3 and heard at Chicago that the hostile Indians had run away westward, says Brigadier General Hugh L. Scott, chief of the general staff, U. S. A., writing from Thompsons, Utah.

We were prepared to follow them wherever they might go and expected they would go across the Grand canyon, Colorado. We left the railroad at Thompsons, Utah, on March 8, and after drives of thirty-eight, sixty-five and forty-eight miles, part of the time on sledges in snow three feet deep, we arrived at Bluff, Utah, the scene of the recent fight with the United States marshal's posse.

Bluff is the end of all communication. Taking Messrs. Creel and Jenkins of the Indian department and some Navajos who had been arrested at Beautiful mountain a year and a half ago and were strong indorsers of my integrity, we started west, down the San Juan river to Mexican Hat.

John Wetherell, after a ride of 100 miles, brought in a Ute Indian who came to his store at Kayenta, fifty miles south. From the Ute we found that the hostile Indians had taken all the Ute's Piutes with them to Navajo mountain, 120 miles west of Bluff, who, with the Piutes already there, numbered 200 in all.

Treated With Great Kindness.

All the Navajos had left in different directions. The Ute was carefully impressed with the importance of urging the hostiles to talk and was convinced that no trap would be set for them. He brought some in after four days, although he had to ride ninety miles to reach them. The others came after and had all arrived by the afternoon of the next day.

They were treated with the utmost kindness, as a wild horse which a false or sudden move would stampede out of sight would be treated. Assured of their safety and well fed, their condition and acts were carefully explained in conferences and interviews covering two days. No ultimatum was given, the door being left for further discussion.

I prepared to stay for a day, a week or a month until the time was ripe to put the question, "What are you going to do?" with certainty that my advice would be followed. The answer was, "We are going to do what you tell us."

"Very well. I tell you four, for whom the marshal has warrants, to go with me to the court at Salt Lake, and I leave in an hour."

Our success was considered a miracle at Bluff and places on the way north. It was the miracle always accomplished by reasoning with an Indian in a kindly, sympathetic way by any one who can gain his confidence and guide him with kind, steady firmness toward the right.

They came along freely without handcuffs or guards, curious about everything they saw and trustful that they were being taken care of.

KANSAS TO HONOR INDIAN.

Proposes Monument For William Walker, First Provisional Governor.

A bill has been passed by the senate of Kansas appropriating several hundred dollars for a monument to mark the grave of William Walker, a Wyandotte Indian, who was the first provisional governor of Kansas and was buried in Kansas City, Kan. There was considerable argument over the bill, and the venerable Senator L. P. King, who served in the Indian wars, gave a short speech in favor of the bill in the purest Sioux, although it was quite unintelligible to most present.

William Walker was chief of the Wyandotte tribe, which brought the first church and the first school to Kansas when it emigrated from Ohio to the mouth of the Kaw river in the thirties. When a large number of Indian traders, missionaries and Indians organized the provisional government of the then Nebraska territory they elected Walker the provisional governor. This territory included all of Kansas and Nebraska and parts of Oklahoma and Colorado. Walker served until the territorial government of Kansas was organized in 1854, when Samuel Reeder was appointed. Reeder was forced by the slavery exponents later to flee the country.

Walker also figured in the "American Notes" of Charles Dickens. Dickens met Walker in St. Louis and considered him a most remarkable man.

Ship Chased by Submarine.

Captain Whimster of the British steamer Parthenia, which arrived in Baltimore from Glasgow, reported that on March 11 when off the southeast coast of Ireland the Parthenia was chased for two hours by a German submarine.

TOO MANY PIGS IN GERMANY.

Total Is 25,500,000, and Government Orders Wholesale Slaughter.

London.—The London Times says the Prussian minister of the interior has issued a rescript insisting upon the slaughtering of pigs upon a large scale and threatening that if voluntary efforts do not have the required result the government will use compulsion. The rescript says that a census taken on Dec. 2 showed that the stock of cattle in Germany was extraordinarily large, and that the number of pigs was about 25,500,000, a total which only once before had been reached. The agrarians are warned that the slaughtering of 5,000,000 or 6,000,000 pigs is quite insufficient and that instead of impeding they must now promote the arrangements for the buying up of pigs by municipalities.

According to the Frankfurter Zeitung, it has been decided that the government shall seize and regulate the distribution of oil cake and other manufactured fodder. It is said that prices have been forced up by speculators.

40,714 BILLS INTRODUCED.

Statistics Show That Out of This Number but 700 Were Enacted Into Law.

Washington, March 23.—During the last session of the Sixty-third congress, according to a statement prepared by James M. Baker, secretary of the United States senate, 40,714 bills introduced in congress were acted upon by both houses.

In the senate the total number of joint resolutions introduced were 7,996. House bills numbered 30,058, and those enacted totaled 700. Two bills and joint resolutions were passed by both houses which failed of enactment and seven which passed both houses died in conference.

Four bills were vetoed by President Wilson. The total simple and concurrent resolutions introduced in both houses numbered 1,426.

PARSON TELLS HOW HE WOULD ACT AS MAYOR

Preacher Candidate Plans No Anti-Liquor Movement.

Greenwich, Conn. — "This borough will be run like any business concern. All of the people will be like the stockholders of a big business house. The town will be managed for their benefit, without regard to politics, if I am chosen mayor."

So said the Rev. Charles F. Taylor, "the fighting parson," when he outlined the platform on which he will stand firmly when he runs for mayor of Greenwich. Dr. Taylor, pastor of the Second Congregational church, one of the wealthiest here, has accepted a nomination for mayor on an independent ticket. He is a muscular Christian, standing six feet two inches, and seemingly in good condition, spiritually and physically.

"The duty of the church and of all good citizens is service to the community," said he. "The best service of practical Christianity is to make all the community happier, healthier, better and freer. And the way to do that is not to begin by hounding so called evildoers. We are all evildoers, for that matter. I mean, the 'cleaning up the town' sort of thing. It isn't that sort of 'strong arm work' that accomplishes things. I know, because when I was a pastor in New York I went in for the vice crusade idea. I even used to go out and serve warrants.

"I shall not begin by trying to close the saloons. I shall not make it my business to seek out violations of the liquor law unless a strong public sentiment demands it, for a law is, after all, only a scrap of paper unless the public is behind it.

"I shall try only to make Greenwich a better place to live in, and I hope before we get through the community will have so many more useful and interesting things to offer that men will not care to spend their time in saloons.

"I do not mean that I shall not enforce the law if I am called upon to do it. I shall. But I mean that my program will be constructive, not merely chasing evils."

Dr. Taylor has preached daringly on civic questions to his wealthy and conservative congregation. So far from resenting his instructions his parishioners have followed them eagerly. The liquor dealers have expressed themselves as not opposed to the clergyman. They say they believe he will give them a "fair deal" as mayor.

ORIGINAL "BOOZE" BOTTLES.

New York.—Two whisky bottles made to resemble a log cabin have been sold at a local antique establishment for the sum of $28 and $30. But it is not their peculiar shape that brought this price. It is the fact that the name "E. C. Booz" is blown into the bottles, which date back to about 1840.

According to the legend, the word "booze" was originated from the habit of drinkers in bygone days who ordered "some of that Booz" when addressing the barkeep. Booz was a distiller of Philadelphia and his product a famous one, so much so that his name became generally used in the vernacular to indicate whisky.

TAYLOR PIONEER EFFICIENCY MAN

Was First to Make System an Applied Science.

MADE IT WORK OF LIFETIME

Put Into Execution His Ideas Regarding Organization In Shop, Factory, Counting Room and Sales Department—Held More Than One Hundred Patents For Various Inventions.

Frederick Winslow Taylor, who died in Philadelphia recently, was the first man to make efficiency an applied science. His life work, as his friend and colleague, Morris L. Cooke, director of public works of Philadelphia, puts it, was "studying peoples' desires for high wages, short hours and an industrial democracy on an economic basis. He did this by increasing their efficiency."

Mr. Taylor was the son of Franklin and Emily Winslow Taylor. He prepared for Harvard at Phillips Exeter academy in 1874, but was forced to leave college through impaired eyesight. However, he entered Stevens Institute of Technology in Hoboken later and was graduated with the degree of mechanical engineer. One year after his graduation he and Miss Louise Spooner of Philadelphia were married. Upon leaving Harvard he had entered the employ of the Midvale Steel company, and in connection with his technical study had continued his work with that corporation.

Taylor started at the bottom. Successively he was gang boss, assistant foreman, foreman of the machine shops, master mechanic, chief draftsman and finally chief engineer. In 1889 he began the study of efficiency engineering. He liked to puzzle over problems to make greater production from a given amount and how to increase the wages of the workman by showing him a better and more efficient manner in which to labor. So wrapped in this subject did he become that Mr. Taylor made it his life work.

His Work in Great Industries.

In 1890 he decided to leave the employ of the Midvale company and put into execution his own ideas regarding scientific management. This meant organization in shop, factory, counting room and sales departments. His success as the pioneer in his chosen field was instantaneous. He was given the problem of organizing great corporations along his own individualistic lines. These included the Bethlehem Steel company, Cramps' and the Midvale Steel company.

He turned his trained mind toward efficiency in cutting metals. Hitherto there was a great deviation in the work of the tools. To rectify this Mr. Taylor began experiments that finally resulted in the Taylor-White process for treating modern high speed tools. So successful was he in this field that he produced tools whose cutting efficiency varies less than 1 per cent. With Maunsel White he also invented a process of treating steel that required wonderful scientific investigation.

In addition, Mr. Taylor received more than a hundred patents for various inventions connected with high speed tools and was awarded the gold medal at the Paris exposition in 1900 and the Elliot Cresson medal of the Franklin institute.

Honors thick and fast were also conferred on the distinguished engineer. He was given the degree of doctor of science by the University of Pennsylvania in 1906 and doctor of laws by Hobart college in 1912. He was also elected president of the American Association of Mechanical Engineers, serving from 1905 to 1906.

REDFIELD HITS "STUCK UP."

Rebukes Man Who Objects to Work Beneath His Position.

Secretary Redfield of the department of commerce has rebuked an employee of his department who is said to have complained recently that he was required to do work beneath his position.

"I do not know what the kind of work can be which is beneath any man's position," the secretary wrote the employee in passing on his case. "I think there is no work of which I know or have heard that is beneath my dignity to do, and I am glad to say that I have done the plainest and hardest and, what is sometimes mistakenly called the most menial work and am ready to do it again if there is occasion for it."

BIG GUN CRUMPLES CAR.

Fourteen Inch Giant Causes Smash on Way to Sandy Hook.

So heavy is a great fourteen inch gun just completed to guard New York city from hostile attack that it broke down one of the two flat cars conveying it along the West Shore railroad, near Cornwall, N. Y., on its way to Sandy Hook to be mounted.

It is said to be the most powerful fourteen inch gun ever made. It was on its way from Watervliet arsenal when the journal of one of the cars, overtaxed by its excessive weight, wore out and had to be replaced. The gun although about the length of the two cars, the breech resting on the rear car.

Great Rifles Tested at Indian Head Weigh 100 Tons.

The two battleships provided for in the current naval bill may be armed with sixteen inch rifles, the heaviest naval guns ever designed.

While tentative plans for the new ships contemplate vessels similar in general design to the 32,000 ton giants of the California class now building, details of armament and engine equipment are being given unusual attention by navy designers and the results obtained from the fifteen inch main batteries of the newest British and German battleships are being closely watched.

Already the new sixteen inch navy gun has been subjected to tests at the Indian Head proving grounds, and while details of its construction and performance are closely guarded, it is known that the gigantic weapon has given proof of its efficiency. The gun was built at the American naval gun factory.

Some idea of the probable size of the new American gun may be gathered from the fact that each of the eight fifteen-inch guns of the British battleship Queen Elizabeth weighs ninety-six tons, while similar rifles designed in the Krupp works for German battleships laid down this year each weigh more than eighty-two tons. The fourteen inch rifles of the battleships New York and Texas and for the five new American Dreadnoughts now under construction weigh 68.3 tons each, and it is certain that the new sixteen inch weapon weighs more than a hundred tons without its mounting.

Krupp engineers have designed a sixteen inch gun which fires a projectile weighing 2,028 pounds, against the 1,675 pound mass of steel hurled by the fifteen inch rifles adopted for the German navy and the 1,920 pound projectiles poured into the Turkish fortresses of the Dardanelles by the British battleship Queen Elizabeth.

United States navy officers say the American fourteen inch gun is equal of the British or German fifteen inch for all practical purposes. With any target in plain view, it is said, the [illegible] equal range and nearly equal penetration, the difference being more than counterbalanced by the larger number of guns carried.

NAVAL GUN VIBRATION.

Conditions on a Warship When Heavy Firing Is In Progress.

The average civilian has a very vague idea as to the conditions inside a turret on a war vessel while heavy firing is going on.

The greatest force of the vibration from the firing of a gun is naturally just outside the muzzle, and that is outside the turret. So terrific is this vibration that if severe precautions were not taken the deck under the muzzle would be ripped to pieces, sheet iron doors would be wrenched from their hangings and skylights shattered. To guard against these effects the deck under the gun muzzle is reinforced with steel plates about an inch thick and skylights are taken off and replaced with coverings of armor plate.

Of course a very considerable roar and jar are felt inside the turret. Men who are looking for the refinement of precaution recommend that gunners wear shoes with rubber cushioned soles and heels to lessen the jar on the deck.

The air vibration, due either to firing in one's own or some other turret, has caused many cases of gun deafness. To stuff the ears with cotton wool is, of course, the commonest expedient followed by men and officers alike. There is also what is called the Cheatham device, consisting of a mixture of clay and wool. It is very flexible, can be molded to any ear and still allows the wearer to hear orders.

Gun deafness may come immediately as a result of a ruptured ear drum or gradually owing to an injury to the auditory nerve.—London Answers.

"It is infinitely better, however, this being a state of established democratic institutions, that this action be taken by the people themselves, than that it should be possible for a legislative body to take it. Even in the event that the proposal works injustice and does harm to the interests of the people of the state, the responsibility rests upon their own shoulders, where it belongs.

"The widows' pension bill recently passed by the Legislature, which provided that a livving should be paid by the people of the state to those who had become dependent, stablished inevitably the principle that the state owes its dependents, not care, but an independent living. The Legislature was pusillanimous on this measure, not daring to oppose the humanitarian impulse behind it. But it, the agent of the state, assumed a responsibility in the establishment of this new principle, which, by the provisions of a wise constitution, ought to have been denied it. The rsponsibility for establishing the idea that the state owes an independent living to anyone within its confines should rest upon the peoplethemselve s.

Personally, I do not believe that the State of New York should grant an independent living to any one of its citizens, but I do recognize the principle that the voters of the State of New York have a perfect right to establish such a principle. The legislative body cannot interpret the public will on this matter, because the public will has at this time not been expressed.

Up to the People.

"The determination—and this is the crux of my discussion—should lie with the people themselves. It is for them to determine whether they consider that the enactment of paternal laws is in the interest of the commonwealth; whether such laws do not destroy individual initiative, individual character and the sense of individual responsibility, and substitute in their place a patron known as the state which, as time goes on, will make more and more encroachments, until industry and enterprise will be at a discount. The question will then be: Who will be left to tax to pay the bill?

"Another limitation upon the legislative power which seems to me highly desirable, is not along the line of the fundamental concept of what the state is and what it should do, but relates purely to administration. I believe that the establishment of a state board of finance, with the governor at its head and composed of such elective state officers as the new constitution may establish, should be created, and that it should present to the Legislature, as the board of estimate in the cities of the second class of this state, and the board of estimate and apportionment in New York does, a budget covering what this board of finance deems to be necessary expenses of the state for the coming fiscal year, and that the Legislature shall vote or reduce this budget, but shall have no power to amend it otherwise.

"No reform in procedure could be adopted that would raise the legislative level more swiftly than to deprive that body of the opportunity of log-rolling for appropriations.

"The executive officers of the state are charged with the administration of its affairs. The legislative body has no part in such administration. It is chosen primarily for the purpose of voting the people's money for the administration. Whereas today it requires a surgical operation by high-minded men in the Legislature to keep down appropriations, under this proposal every member of the Legislature will become a critic of the administration's budget.

"The system has worked well in the cities of this state. It would work well in the government of the state. It would keep out of the Legislature men who go there for a specific interest, clear the decks for the consideration of matters which are purely legislative, and clarify the minds of the voters when they pass upon the qualifications of their administrative officers.

"One of the evils resulting from the free legislative power has been the tinkering with the charters of the cities of the state. Since Jan. 1, 1899, [illegible] of the second class have been changed by the enactment of the charter governing those cities, from this pernicious habit, but no home rule proposal will ever become effective unless there is placed in the constitution of the state a prohibition upon the legislative power to amend charters after they have been granted. The municipalities of the state lo not possess an independent existence. The privilege of governing themselves has been granted to them by the people of the whole state, and that grant should be as broad as consistent with the sovereignty of the state. Once made, however, it should not be subject to more legislative amendment to meet the mind of newly elected city officers. The grant should have a constitutional guarantee of some kind behind it.

"It is entirely possible to lay out such uniform and broad provisions in a municipal charter that the people of any community can govern themselves properly under it, if they are competent to govern themselves at all, and, if they are not competent to govern themselves, there is no reason why the state government should intervene, and so postpone the day when they will be.

"To sum up, I believe that:

"(1) The voters should be educated that the constitution is the people's law.

"(2) The Legislature should be deprived of the power of originating appropriations; but it should grant or reduce a budget made by a state board of finance.

"(3) The legislative body should be deprived of its powers to amend charters of municipalities at will. The constitution itself should provide some method of guaranteeing a charter against amendment.

"(4) The constitution should be compressed as much as possible, eliminating all specific provisions that should come within the legislative power. It should be made, what every American constitution should be:

"First, An instrument of government in the simplest form; and,

Secondly. An enumeration of the limitations upon the legislative power in terms defined with such perfect clarity that there can be no possible misinterpretations of their meaning, thereby preserving to the voters themselves, and not to their representatives in the Legislature, the power to determin the principles upon which their government shall rest, and by which it must be controlled until such time as they shall again make manifests their will.

"If the constitutional convention will do these things and the people will adopt their recommendations, I believe that an era of more coherent public thinking will ensue, and that the state itself can secure a more intelligently conducted state administration.

"But in making these suggestions I do not wish to be placed in the category of those who believe that by constitutional or by statute law people can be remade, that thereby administration will automatically become perfect, or that permanent progress, constitutionally or otherwise will come unless men competent, public-spirited and fearless, are placed by the voters in the chair of respsonsibility."

FULTON-HANNIBAL ROAD 14 FEET WIDE

An important meeting was held Saturday by the Highway Committee of the Board of Supervisors and Superintendent Howard, when it was announced that the State Highway Department will not permit the Fulton-Hannibal road to be made more than 14 feet wide. The town board wants the road to be 16 feet wide.

The Hannibal Town Board has appropriated $1,100 to place crushed stone on the road from Cramer's farm to the Oswego Town line. This is expected to make a satisfactory highway of this stretch of road.

ALBANY LETTER DAY BY DAY

By FREDERIC T. CARDOZE

Albany, April 6.—Senator Robert F. Wagner, majority leader of the Senate, says that the Republicans in the legislature is making an attempt to tear down the beneficent labor legislation which has been enacted during the past four years and that the attempt is being met with vigorous opposition from the working classes and from all citizens of the State who are interested in the betterment of the conditions attending the employment of the working people.

"All of this legislation was written into law only after a most thorough study of the conditions under which our laboring men and women are employed," says Senator Wagner in discussing the matter," and it is conceded by everyone who has given the subject the least thought that the legislationw ith regard to the employment of women and cheildren in the canning establishments of our State, the Workmens' Compensation law, the amendments to the labor law regarding the bours of labor in different industries, smoking in factories, fire drills, overcrowded work rooms and the various other sanitary provisions, are the most progressive reforms in the interest of the working people that have ever been passd in th history of the State of New York.

Senator Wagner declares that the Republicans evidently believe that the Democrats have been to considerate of the needs of the working classes and to substantiate his argument points out that a number of bills have been introduced by the majority during the present session which have for their aim the weakening the existing statutes. He cites the bill which he says practicalyear regarding the employment of women in canning establishments; the measure amending the Labor law in regard to one day of rest in seven; various amendments to hee Workmens' Compensation law and many other labor meaurs which he says will result in tearing down of many of the present laws which have been universally approved by all those interested in the question of labor reform.

"Especially amusing to me has been the argument advanced in behalf of the legislation relating to the employment of the canneries of the State," continues Senator Wagner. "The innocent listener will be lead to believe that the women employed in this industry were merly enjoying a sort of vacation and the picture would be portrayed of the mother and children going out into the country as a family would go to a picnic, where the children were receiving the benefits which nature can alone provide for them; fresh air, proper rest and all the other luxuries which the vacationist alone receives.

"But what are the true conditions? These mothers have been obliged to labor from early morning until late into the night with little opportunity for proper rest. The children were bound to be working from twelve to fourteen hours a day and the women in some instances from fifteen to seventeen hours a day. We found the ages of the children ranged from four years upward. Can anyone imagine what charm nature would have for these women and children after working these hours?"

The argument which Senator Wagner advances regarding the activity of the Republican legislators to annul labor organization laws, is based upon what he himself saw as chairman of the investigating committee which was named to probe conditions in factories of the State. He says that the amendments to the Workmen's Compensation law which have recently been passed will not only tend to devitalize that law, but will also bring about the same abuses which existed prior to the enactment of this legislation, with special reference to the insurance adjuster and the ambulance chasing attorney, as he puts it.

Russian Monastery Shelled by Turkish Ships

THE GREAT RUSSIAN MONASTERY AT SAN STEFANO

This picture shows shells from the cruisers Goeben and Breslau demolishing the Russian Monastery of St. Stefano, twenty miles from Constantinople. After the bombardment the wrecked building was blown up. The monastery of St. Stefano, situated near the village of the same name, nearly two miles from the Sea of Marmora and twenty miles from Constantinople, was erected by the Russian government to commemorate the memory of the soldiers killed in the Russo-Turkish War of 1877, and marks the nearest point to the Turkish capital reached by the Russians before the making of peace. Twenty monks were quartered in the building, whose golden cross has long been an obnoxious sight to Moslem eyes. The picture, which shows the war ships' shells bursting about the dome of the monastery, was smuggled out of the city by a Greek who deserted the Turkish service and brought it to the United States.

Russian Troops Win Unbroken Successes to Gain Footholds

London, April 7.—Frederick Rennet, correspondent of the Daily News at Petrogra, telegraphs:

"Operations in the Carpathians are developing with unbroken success. Two advances now are progressing from a hinge around Bartfeld, one turning westward toward an extended line of the enemy's defences along the Dunajetz and the other southward from the passes beginning with Uzsok. An immense number of prisoners now are passing into the interior."

Dr. E. J. Dillon, correspondent of the Daily Telegraph at Rome, says:

"Rumors of Austria's desire for a separate peace and of informal overtures to Russia for its attainment have been frequent of late. Being in contact with sources of information worthy of implicit confidence, I am absolutely certain they are devoid of foundation. In fact, the Austrian Emperor proclaims himself a German potentate and is resolved to act the part at every cost.

"The question of a separate peace never has been considered even speculatively. From Budapest I am assured by an equally trustworthy authority that no member of the Cabinet or party entertains at present any views on the subject differing materially from those held in Vienna.

"With regard to Turkey's alleged eagerness to conclude a separate peace and the assertion that tentative efforts are about to be made in Switzerland in which the new Russian Ambassador to the Quirinal is expected to take part, I am enabled to state they are as misleading as the stories afloat about Austria's proposals."

Allied Invasion of Hungary Is Allies' New Plan

London, April 7.—Invasion by the allies of Hungary, working through Servia, was forecase for the first time in London dispatches last night as the big feature of the spring plan of campaign.

Belief that the Russians will succeed in their drive into Hungary, and the stupendous cost in lives of uprooting the Germans in Flanders, are grounds for the new plan of attack by the allies. If they could hold their ground in the west, at the same time getting into Hungary and joining hands with the Russian forces there, they could deal a severe blow to Germany through her weaker ally.

In carrying out this movement the allied forces could operate either through Greece or through Bulgaria, both of which countries so far are still maintaining their neutrality.

Eliminating the only available Montenegrin (and allied) barbor of Antivari, on the Adriatic, which would be of little use to an army because of the complete lack of railway communications through Montenegro, the allies in order to cross Servia, would have to land their forces either at Salonika or else at Dedeagatch, one of the two Bulgarian ports on the Aegean, which, like Salonika, has direct railway communication with Servia and thence with Hungary.

LLOYD GEORGE FINDS MAN OF "PUSH AND GO"

London, April 7.—A notice issued by the British War Office that Lord Kitchener has appointed a committee to take the necessary steps to provide such additional labor as may be required to obtain that supply of munitions of war that shall be sufficient to meet all requirements and that communications in regard to this subject should be addressed to Mr. George M. Booth, at the War Office, has given rise to the impression that Mr. Booth is the man of "push and go" for whom Mr. Lloyd George has been seeking.

Interview last night on the subject, however, Mr. George MacCauley Booth, who is a son of Mr. A. A. Booth, chairman of the Cunard line, and who is keen and alert and quite evidently possessed of tremendous energy, was quite modest.

Asked if he was chairman or secretary of the committee, Mr. Booth said he was neither.

"I suppose communications are being addressed to me because the other members of the committee are too busy to deal with them," he remarked.

According to some authorities, Mr. Booth is likely to be elected a director of the Bank of England in place of the late C. H. Goshen.

ITALY'S SECOND SHIP SUNK BY GERMANS

London, April 7.—R. Mackenzie, the Daily News correspondent, telegraphs from Rome:

The conviction prevails throughout Italy that German pirates have sunk two Italian steamships, the Luigi Parodi, which left Baltimore January 23, and the Pina, which left Naples forty days ago for Cardiff, all efforts to ascertain the fate of the two steamships being fruitless. Their owners are convinced that they have been sunk by Germans and the crews downed.

"The belief that these vessels were sunk has aroused fierce anti-German hostility in Italy. The German Embassy has issued a carefully worded denial, omitting to mention the Pina, and explaining that Parodis Luigi courses were outside of the German war zone and that she can not therefore, have been torpedoed. The form of the denial almost confirms the suspicion that the Parodis was sunk by Germans.

"This affair might lead to serious complications. Decisive action is likely to be taken at any moment."

BELGIAN PRINCE, AT 13, IN COMMAND OF TROOPS

London, April 7.—The Daily Telegraph's correspondent wires from Havre:

"Prince Leopold, the elder son of King Albert and Queen Elizabeth of Belgium, who is thirteen and a half years old, has for the last three months been in constant touch with the Belgian army. He begged his father to allow him to enter the service, and at length King Albert consented t othe Prince joining a regiment of the line glorious for its defence of Dixmude. The Prince was received Monday into the regiment, which paraded, with its flag at the head, before the King and Queen.

"King Albert expressed the joy he felt to see Prince Leopold enter the heroic regiment whose glory, won at the battle of the Yser, would never be excelled. Prince Leopold weares the uniform of the regiment, and, as he is unusually tall, does not in the least suggest a thirteen-year-old soldier.

"Before the entire regiment the colonel commanding gave the young Prince the accolade, and then the regiment, with its newest recruit wearing a proud and martial air, marched past the King and Queen."

CHEMICAL TANKS MEAN LOWER INSURANCE RATES

The Fire and Police Board met last night in executive session and, in addition to transacting routine business, a matter of vital importance to every property owner in the city was discussed.

The board proposes to equip both hose wagons with 35-gallon chemical tanks thereby making combination wagons of the apparatus. The combination wagon is the most used piece of apparatus in the departments in most cities and the chemical tanks extinguish the majority of the fires. Chemicals have many advantages over water—they kill the fire quicker and do less damage to property as small amount of chemical will do more against a fire than a great quantity of water.

The action on the part of the Commissioners has been recommended by the Board of Insurance Underwriters, and when the wagons are equipped with the chemicals, the underwriters promise a big reduction in insurance rates throughout the city. The new equipment would rate the city as Class A as regards fire protection and while the exact reduction cannot be learned, it will make an appreciable difference in the rates and premiums on all property within the city.

Opinions

Playing Into Billy Sunday's Hands

At the two poles of religious psychology stand the Unitarians and Billy Sunday. The home hitting, base running, hell defying evangelist has called the Unitarians "muts." He who has swallowed the Bible at a gulp has with equal brevity and finality thus rejected its careful masticators. And they, foolishly, are repeating this rejection.

It is, of course, nonsense for the Unitarians to seek to fight Billy Sunday except by heaping coals of fire on his undoubtedly tough cranium. To "hire a hall" within a few blocks of the Paterson Tabernacle, and to combat the man with something like his own weapons, seems too hysterical a scheme to be credited to a sect so clamly rationalistic. The threat to requisition Mr. Taft and Dr. Eliot as opposition orators only betrays the more degree of madness to which the Sunday epithet has stung the members of the Board of Defense. How could these two gentlemen, with their courteous appeals to reason, hope to escape playing into their antagonist's hands? One can picture their tossing their philosophy like baseballs to his mighty bat and his glee as he knocked three baggers and home runs and raced round the bases to the delirious applause of the multitude.

The Unitarians can better afford than any other denomination to ignore Billy Sunday's abuse, since their members are recruited least from his emotional followers. They can much better afford to ignore than to resent it.—New York Press.

Making the Women Pay

So far as The Tribune knows there was no plank in the last Republican national platform declaring for a twelve-hour day for women.

If there was such a principle enunciated in the last platform of the Republican party in this state this newspaper is equally uninformed about it.

Yet it is a fact that the whole machinery of the Republican party in the State Legislature is being employed to drive through an enactment providing a twelve-hour day, six days a week, for the women who work in canning factories.

To discuss such a proposal from any point of view of public policy is a waste of time. Such an enactment would not merely be bad legislation. it would be an insult to every humanitarian instinct, to every fraction of common decency in this state. It would be a direct repudiation of the spirit and the sentiment of contemporary progress.

For if there was one thing above another real and vital in the late Progressive revolution, if there was one impulse, which was not temporary or evanescent, it was revealed in the words and the enthusiasm of thousands of men and women who had themselves given their lives to making living a little more tolerable, the conditions of life and labor of the less fotunate a bit more comfortable. To these men and women the Progressive party meant the promise that henceforth the machinery of government, the law and the machinery of the law, were to be applied to the alleviation of evils, the remedying of abuses, the mitigration of sufferings due to the inequalities in the social conditions of men and women.

Vague, emotional, sweeping beyond the bounds of possibility or desirability, these dreams of the Progressives — the sincere and the loyal Progressives of 1912 — were. But with the impossible there was much that was possible, with the transitory much that was bound to be permanent. Nor is it less patent that the same spirit, the same purpose, the same intent, is to be found in the words and deeds of the thousands of women who are seeking the ballot that they may use it to protect women, to procure the repeal of unjust laws, the passage of fair enactments regulating the conditions and hours of labor for women.

In the face of all this contemporary demand for social justice in its narrowest and simplest form, the Legislature of the State of New York now proposes to repeal laws which protect women who must work in factories and to enact a law which will make twelve hours a day, six days a week, the portion of women who must support their children or themselves by working in canning factories.

What is the profit in such legislation? The answer to this question is the exposure of the utter meanness of the whole project. Such a law will be of political advantage to two or three legislators coming from districts in which the canning industry is an important local trade. It will mean some dollars in campaign contributions in a few counties, some votes in a few isolated districts. This is the maximum of the benefit that is to be discovered.

And for such a contemptible gain, for a profit as mean and sordid as this, the State of New York is to be made to give its sanction to a law which can find no defence in humanity, no justification in any argument based on common decency.

Such arguments as must be raised against this bill will hardly obtain a hearing in Albany under present conditions, yet The Tribune ventures to suggest to its women readers, to its friends who are the officers and leaders in the movement to win the ballot for women, a cause in which this newspaper is enlisted, that never was there an opportunity to fight for the protection of women against "man made" laws more unmistakable, more conspicuous. It is an opportunity made to hand, and it will be a misfortune if it is permitted to pass unaccepted.

Meantime is it, perhaps, permitted a Republican newspaper to inquire whether it is the hope of the Republican leaders of this state to drive the present measure through the Legislature solely to provide themselves with a campaign issue for nxet year? Do they want to fight the next state campaign on the issue, "Twelve hours a day, six days a week; this is the portion of labor for women"?—N. Y. Tribune.

WANTED---FRANKNESS

The prospects of an intelligent and honest reply (or replies) to two letters that have appeared in The Evening Times at the present time are not at all bright. It is true there have floated from the mouths of different men high in the official family of the city denials of the rumors of dissatisfaction in the Board of Tax Assessors, but those denials do not begin to slake the natural thirst for a whole-hearted confession to the causes which led up to the resignation of one member of the Board and the threatened resignation of another member of the same body of officials, together with the glee expressed by the minority member—a Democrat—who quite naturally rejoiced in the predicted downfall of the Republican party in this city.

A writer, whose nom-de-plume for the present is, "Inquirer," informed the readers of this newspaper that Mayor Fox says the people are not interested in the causes leading up to the resignation of Mr. Hulett, all of which is productive of the inquiry, since when has the city's chief executive become the public's guardian? And, since when has the same official been authorized to establish a censorship upon matters pertinent to public business?

"Inquirer" is right in demanding of the Mayor and the City Attorney the truth of the whole story. He along with hundreds of other men are interested in the causes that brought about the resignation of Mr. Hulett.

Unless The Evening Times is mistaken in the men of this city—the men who have the capacity and the standing required for leadership—not even the Mayof of Fulton can afford to flaunt defience in their faces, or in the faces of the rank and file of the taxpayers.

Fulton has shown in more than one way that its citizenship is made up of men of intrepid moral courage—men who are held in honor. But today there are hundreds of taxpayers who are looking to the Mayor and the City Attorney for that brand of frankness which spells whole-heartedness in public affairs.

PHYSICAL ENDURANCE

A man cannot work without rest, but he can rest without work.

Managers of men are looking into this question of what employes do nights, which has an important bearing on what they can do days.

If you eat a big sirloin steak, a hunk of plum pudding, the legs of two lobsters, drink a bowl of soup, two cups of coffee, and a couple of cocktails, and then smoke three or four black cigars and a few cibarettes and remain up until two o'clock in the morning, how do you expect to fill a full-sized job the next day?

It is not a question of "goodness"—not a moral problem. It is a plain question of physical endurance.—Silent Partner.

RECKLESSNESS OR FEAR?

The opinions of politicians, as everybody knows, can be better judged from their actions than their words; and not unnaturally the women of the State are trying to guess from the actions of the present legislature what the wise men of Albany prophesy will be the outcome of the suffrage referendum next November. At first sight the result must be discouraging to the suffragists. With the exception of the mothers' pension bill, legislation affecting women is reveiving severe treatment. Mr. Hinman cracks the party whip to pass the cannery bills, which decrease as far as possible the restrictions on the working hours of women and children in the canneries. The bill abolishing the Department of Weights and Measures—a department so necessary to housekeepers—has already passed one House. Senator Sage has introduced a bill which would practically prevent the early closing of department stores. To all these bills feminine voters would presumably be opposed. The first inference is that the gentlemen at Albany see little danger in antagonizing the women of the State.

But another interpretation is possible. If women are going to vote, legislation like the cannery bills must be passed now or never. The same thing has been noticed before now in suffrage states; laws objectionable to women have been rushed through during the last session before the referendum. Politicians have to deal first with the present. They cross no bridges they have not reached. At the moment women have not the vote. Ingratiation with the new voters may be left until after November. The cannery bills may not. Perhaps women ought to see a promise of victory in the very haste with which bills opposed to their interests are being taken up and passed.—New York Tribune.

Naval Loss That Counts

Measured in terms in single ships, the reported destruction in the Dardanelles of the pre-dreadnought battle ship Lord-Nelson is the heaviest so far sucered by the British navy. This noble vessel, ordered in the estimates of 1904, represented the highest level of war construction attained previous to the startling appearance in 1906 of the original dreadnought. Hence her four 12-inch 45-calibred and ten 9-inch 50-calibred guns constituted the last assembly in Admiralty design of the mixed heavy battery hitherto controlling, all succeeding battle ship types mounting the new and revolutionary installation of unit calibred ordnance.

As with her guns so with her speed, an immediate advance being made from the Lord Nelson's 18½ knots to the 21 knots of the first and many succeeding dreadnoughts, and thence by successive increments to the 25 knots on 58,000-horse power of the Queen Elizabeth class. So highly were the Lord Nelson and her sister, the Agamemnon, rated in British enumerations of sea power that these two vessels were placed only just below the dreadnoughts laid down, let us say, up to 1909. They were in appearance quite unlike other vessels of the fleet, resembling rather more closely contemporaneous French types, and it has been claimed that their tactial diameter, their turning circle, was so small that practically they could spin around almost in their own length.—New York Herald.

TRUSTEE TAKES VILLAGE INTO SUPREME COURT

Supervisor John J. Sinnott of Mt. Pleasant, who was appointed Trustee of Hillsdale, in the northern part of Westchester County, recently, when that village, the smallest in New York State, was legislated out of existence because the officials quarreled all the time and were unable to collect the taxes, applied today for instructions to Supreme Court Justice Tompkins. He had found it as difficult to settle the affairs of the village as everyone living there predicted.

The only things worth saving which Mr. Sinnott found were a portable police station, an empty safe, a couple of tables, and half a dozen chairs. The village owed $800 for street lighting and $350 in fees to Clinton T. Taylor, who acted as corporation counsel. Mr. Taylor had an execution against the village, and had directed the Sheriff to guard the police station, fearing that some one mould cart it oc. There were $800 due in taxes, but how to collect them Supervisor Sinnott did not know.

Hillsdale was incorporated in 1898. Recently the chief of police raided a poker game and was locked up in the portable police station by another official, who then yelled through the window to him that he was confined for the crime of entering a house without a warrant. The chief had a key and escaped.

Justice Tompkins took the matter under consideration.

APRIL

By I. E. Hyde

You've crossed the line, dear April;
You're really here at last,
With smiles, and tears, and sunshine,
You're sure to travel fast.
We could not do without you,
We need your crystal ray,
We need your gift of diamonds
To deck the flowers of May.
We need your birds and sunshine
To quell old winter's gloom,
For you are just the lassie
To make the springtime bloom.
Our hearts will beat the faster;
Our souls more open be.
We welcome you, Sweet April;
You've made our sorrows flee.
You bring us many changes;
New friends we have to make;
Our hearts are with the old ones;
Those ties can never break.
But, out, we'll fling our banner
To welcome friends and you;
'Tho our hearts are with the old friends,
We'll try to love the new.

To Protect Apple Crop from Insects

Insect pests that cause wormy and deformed apples have at least one time in their lives when they may be killed by spraying. Such is the statement made by the New York state college of agriculture in a recently publish reading-course lesson for the farm entitled "Insects Injurious to the Fruit of the Apple." This publication gives descriptions and brief life histories of the codling moth, the apple maggot, the apple redbugs, the fruit-tree leaf-roller, and the green fruit worms, and points out in each case the effective time to apply sprays, and gives formulas for mixin gthe poison.

The subject of spraying is one of particular importance to apple growers, says the college, especially since the passage of federal and state laws regulating the packing and shipping of apples. If apple growers are to produce marketable fruit it must be free from insect blemish, and in order to produce such fruit, growers must know the habits of the injurious insect pests and how to control them.

Any residents of New York State may obtain their reading course lesson by applying to the state college of agriculture.

QUARANTINE PROHIBITS MOVING OF CATTLE

Further restrictions have been placed upon the counties of Jefferson, St. Lawrence and Lewis, as a result of the hoof and mouth disease, in an order received by Deputy Commissioner of Agriculture C. E. Sackett from Calvin J. Huson, Commissioner of Agriculture. The order states that the shipment, transportation, trailing, driving or other movement of horses, cattle, sheep and swine into these counties is hereby prohibited. The order further states:

"No cattle, sheep or swine shall be moved or transported out of said counties except for immediate slaughter. Animals so moved for immediate slaughter shall be transported in cleaned and disinfected cars and shall not be unloaded in any public stockyard within any of said counties.

"The transportation or movement of any such animals from one township to another within said counties is prohibited, except under permits duly issued under direction of the State Department.

"Animals already en route to any point within said counties, shall at destination have feet cleaned, and feet and ankles shall be washed in disinfectant, and otherwise handled in such manner as circumstances may require.

"The following disinfectant shall be used: Five per cent. solution of carbolic acid, or three per cent. solution of cresol compound, U. S. P. This order will remain in effect until daily revoked."

The Liver is a blood purifier. It was thought one time it was the seat of the passions. AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF AN ONLY SON

MAN'S CHANCE

By Sands Devillo Gardner

Did it ever occur to you that man's life is full of crosses and temptations? "He comes into this world without his consent and goes out against his will, and the trip between the two is exceedingly rocky. The rule of contraries is one of the features of the trip. When he is little, the big girls kiss him, and when grown the little girls kiss him. If he is poor, he is a bad manager, and if he is rich, he is dishonest. If he needs credit he can't get it. If he is prosperous every one wants to do him a favor. If he is in politics it's for the pie. If he is out of politics you can't find a place for him and he is no good to his country. If he doesn't give to charity he is a stingy galoot; if he does it's for show. If he is actively religious he is a hypocrite; if he takes no interest in religion he is a hardened sinner. If he shows affection he is a soft specimen; if he seems to care for no one he is cold-blooded. If he dies young there was a great future before him; if he has lived to an old age he has missed his calling. The road is rocky, but man loves to travel it."

The above is man's verdict, so we see that if man were to be the Judge Supreme we should all fail. These are two roads for man to travel—the straight and narrow road, in which the main chance is to "lay up treasure in heaven, where moth and rust doth not corrupt and thieves do not break through and steal," the end which is life everlasting; and the broad road in which the main chance is to lay up treasure on earth where moth and rust doth corrupt and thieves do break through and steal, the end being ruin and destruction.

It has been truly said that "man is the creature of circumstances," and the reader will find the saying confirmed in the following:

Bonaparte in a great degree controlled until he "met his Waterloo." In an illustrated article in Harper's Magazine I saw a picture of the "Little Corporal" on a back seat in a hack with four horses attached going at full speed. A relay of fresh horses were on hand on the route so that the high rate of speed was kept kept up all day. He slept some on the journey, and at night when he reached the end of it everything was bustle and activity and he tired out four secretaries, allowing himself only four hours' sleep out of the twenty-four.

The Alps were in his way of transporting troops. "There shall be no Alps!" he exclaimed. And a rough road was constructed through and over them. For the sake of power and selfish ambition he threw aside his first love, Josephine, and united his fortunes with a haughty lady, Maria Theresa, that gave him prestige with another country.

Rev. W. L. Sawtelle and wife of Fulton in the fall of 1905, on their trip in Europe, hired a team and guide and visited the field of Waterloo. They found it all occupied by farms and fields of waving grain. They drove to all the principal points. The spot was pointed out where Bonaparte stood, also the place occupied by Wellington during the battle. He said Bonaparte lost the day by the nod of a peasant's head. That he spent the night up to 2 o'clock in the morning previous to the battle attending to the [illegible] and riding his horse over the entire field. He finally came to [illegible] point or side of the field and met a peasant. He asked him if [illegible] side of the field was smooth and all right? He nodded his [illegible] and the General took it for granted that it was. Just across [illegible] where they stood, extending across that side was sunken road. He was satisfied that he had done his best turned his horse and rode away without discovering it. That night a tall, gay, young Irishman in a dress suit was attending a dance near by. That was the "Iron Duke" who wore the same suit at the battle the next day. The fighting began the next day at eleven o'clock. Marshal Ney, Bonaparte's great cavalry leader, had led his unconquerable host from victory to victory and was flushed with successes. The Marshal, with confidence and assurance, formed his cavalry for a desperate charge. At the command they started with all the force and fury they were capable of. The English presented a solid front ready to receive them. Marshal Ney and his cavalry were under full headway when they reached the sunken road, the horses in the front rank going down into it and other from behind filling it up, which weakened the charge and gave the victory to the English. General Bonaparte, from his position, saw it and at once exclaimed, "All is lost!" The intense selfishness of the man proved to be his ruin. It is very difficult to build up a permanent success by ruining and injuring and tearing down other people's prospects. A wise Providence is sure to interfere with a combination of circumstances for "right is always might."

Every locality has its original characters, people who say and do things different from anyone else, and if they attract the attention of the public don't seem to be affected by it.

A practical everyday old farmer from Connecticut was engaged by a Farmers Institute in Fulton to appear on the platform to tell how he managed to raise seven tons of timothy hay to the acre by intense culture, beginning with a few acres of wornout land. He was a man perhaps sixty-five years old, weighing about two hundred pounds, with sterling commonsense, but had very little education, with simple unaffected ways, which, with his comical remarks, attracted and interested the audience. A friend in front of me, who was a college graduate, turned and said, "Well, the old fellow is original anyhow." I learned he was called Senator at home.

"At a gathering in Australia not long since four persons met. Three of whom were shepherds on a sheep farm. One of these had taken a degree at Oxford, another at Cambridge, the third at a German university. The four was their employer, a squatter rich in flocks and herds, not scarcely able to read, much less able to keep accounts.

Commodore Vanderbilt was asked once what was the secret of success in life. His reply was "Keep your eyes and ears open and your mouth shut."

FOR THE SMALL GIRL

Black and White Considered Smart For Child's Garment.

DRESSY COAT.

Much thought and careful planning is expended upon the toilet of the small maid. The pretty coat shown in the illustration is one of the smartest models shown this season.

Black and white checked material was used. A wide belt of the material is finished in front with a sash of soft satin. The collar and cuffs are of embroidered pique, lace trimmed. A chic bonnet of French blue satin has a double frilled brim, soft crown, with trimming of red cherries.

WOMEN WEAR PLUMAGE.

Men Are Relegated to Background in Clothing Decorative.

In the very beginning of things it was man who was the highly decorated animal. Up to within a couple of hundred years ago the dress of men remained more ornate than that of women. Feathers, satins, ruffles, tinsel, buckles, all contributed, with the aid of paint and powder, to make man a bird of gayer plumage than his mate.

But times have changed. Man has sobered. He now does not decorate himself unless he is an army officer, a juggler or a lodge member. He wears clothes that are practically a uniform. The uniform varies, but it is essentially a uniform.

Woman retains her privilege to wear plumage. She acquired this privilege long after the man. Doubtless she will be long after man in giving it up.

Anyway, the world never before saw such extraordinary things done in the way of costume as are done today. The keynote was struck long ago, as may be seen in the unearthed queens of Egypt. If the Greek women were content with flowing lines the queen of Sheba was probably splendid in garb.

The fantasies of today are impartially distributed in the ballroom, on the street and on the stage.

The hair is worn high or falls like a shower of gold. The hat is plumed in a Gaby swirl, waving like a small forest, or it shrinks over plastered hair until scarcely bigger than the lid of a powder box. The woman's wrap is flimsy as a spider's web, or it buries her to the eyes in fur. Fur has been epidemic. She has not worn it on the edges of her handkerchief. Certainly she has worn it on everything else, and what is the end?

One Hostess' Secret.

A very successful hostess was asked the secret of her success with her dinners. She said that when she heard a friend mention a dish that he liked or disliked very much she jotted it down in a small memorandum book, and when she planned her dinner she consulted the book first. The consequence was she never served string beans to the man who detested them nor ice cream to the woman who couldn't "endure cream in any form."

ACTIVITIES OF WOMEN.

There are ten women investors where there was one ten years ago.

Women in New Jersey are now eligible to appointment as police officers.

The rule regulations at Radcliffe college compel the girl students to learn the use of the slide down the rope fire escape.

The United States supreme court has sustained California's eight hour law for women hotel waitresses.

Los Angeles, Cal., has been offered a $300,000 tract of land by Mrs. Henry E. Huntington to be used for park purposes.

The Sarah Berliner fellowship for women, carrying with it a gift of $1,000, has been awarded to Miss Janet T. Howell of Baltimore. It is considered one of the highest honors that can be won by a woman in this country.

Oregon has five women miners.

India is to have a women's college.

The Finland diet has twenty-one women members.

Arizona, Oregon, Wyoming and Colorado have women legislators.

Henry McDonald of Wilkes-Barre, Pa., says: 'I have used Hanford's Balsam for two years in my stables. It has proven satisfactory in every instance. It has proven satisfactory in every instance. I consider it the best remedy for harness galls and sore shoulders that I have used for the past 27 years in my experience in the livery and boarding stable business.'

The Silent Drama.

"Father, I want to go on the stage."

"Do not be too anxious to push yourself forward, my dear. Little girls should be seen and not heard."

"That fits in all right, dad. It is in the movies that I want to act."—Louisville Courier-Journal.

Mathematical Marvel.

"Humble as I am," said a loud voiced sprouter at a meeting, "I still remember that I am a fraction of this magnificent country."

"You are indeed," said a bystander, "and a vulgar one at that."—Wisconsin State Journal.

The Money Question.

"Wot do they mean, Jimmy, when they say money talks?"

"I dunno unless it's the wonderful way it says goodby to yer."—London Tatler.

Asiatic Russia contains 188 rivers with a total navigable length of 12,500 miles and four lakes that can be navigated for 707 miles.

HONEST WEIGHT STATE FIGHT

League Sends Appeal to Consumers to Protect Measures Department

New York, April 6.—The Housewives' League issued an appeal yesterday for every consumer to join the fight on the bills which seek to abolish the Department of Weights and Measures. Mrs. Julian Heath, president of the league, sounded the call as follows:

"The Housewives' League appeals to every consumer in the state to send the following letter or wire to Frank B. Thorn, of Orchard Park, chairman of the Committee on Judiciary;

" 'As a consumer of New York State I appeal to you to maintain the Department of Weights and Measures as a distinct and separate department of state work.' "

Will Fight to Finish

Discussing the situation yesterday, Mrs. Heath said: "The Housewives' League feels confident that the Assembly will vote against the bills. But if they should be so unwise as to stand for the abolishment of the Department of Weights and Measures, the league will be present to oppose it at the hearing promised by the Governor."

Action has been taken to inform Governor Whitman of the serious opposition to the measures by the following communication, sent to heads of leagues throughout the state:

"A movement is on foot at Albany to abolish the present Department of Weights and Measures, making the state weights and measures work a part of the Department of Agriculture. We believe that this would be a backward step for New York State in the matter of legislation regarding weights and measures, and you are earnestly requested to write or wire your protest to Governor Whitman."

The situation requires hard work, Mrs. Heath said, and unremitting protests should go to Albany from every part of the state.

"The Housewives' League," she said, "earnestly asks for the co-operation of the honest manufacturer and canner as well, because we believe that an efficient weights and measures department is not only for the protection of the consumer, but for the honst dealers in the state.

Fear Blow to Economy

"The Department of Weights and Measures means to the housewife protection; it means more—it means efficiency in home management and it means economy. The league is endeavoring to teach every housewife to put her home on a business basis, and the enforcement of honest weights and measures, so that she can know what she is buying, means businesslike methods for the home.

"To the honest manufacturer the department means fair dealing and efficiency, and it means the elimination of unfair competition, because no honest manufacturer or dealer can compete with a dishonest rival who is shortweighting.

"As an instance, we called to the attention of the city weights and measures department some time ago the case of a grocer. Word came to us that he was selling sugar below the market. We thought that was a fine opportunity to advise our members where they could get their sugar cheaper.

"We investigated. We found that in 3½ pound packages of sugar he was shortweighting from an ounce and a half to ounces. Of course he was getting, by his dishonesty, all the trade in the neighborhood, and the honest dealer was losing it.

Halt Dishonest Dealers

"The enforcement of honest and measures means the elimination of dishonest dealers like that. Instead of the department being reduced in effectiveness, every step should be taken to make it powerful and efficient."

Praise for The Tribune's stand in the matter came yesterday from Fred H. Tighe, deputy commissioner of the Mayor's Bureau of Weights and Measures. Hhe wrote:

"Permit me to congratulate The New York Tribune on its noble work in exposing the viciousness of the proposed legislation that aims to destroy honesty and fair dealing by merging the Department of Weights and Measures with the Agricultural Department.

"Ta enact such legislation into law will destroy the identity and effectiveness of honest weights and measures, and The Tribune could not serve the people of the state in a more worthy cause than in its present protest and gallant fight for honest weights and measures."

TALK GIVEN AT CITY HALL

Individual Responsibility Urged by A. E. Crockett

A. E. Crockett of the Rochester Chamber of Commerce addressed the Chamber of Commerce last night.

The thread of Mr. Crockett's talk was that individual responsibility is the greatest necessity to assure the success of the local, or any other Chamber of Commerce. Rochester has twenty-seven committees of twenty-five members each which are appointed by thep resident as is the chairman, vice-chairman and secretary of each committee.

The committees meet weekly and a report of accomplishments is made. Usually the meeting is held during the luncheon hour and music and other diversions assist in maintaining the enthusiasm. The secretaries of the various committees are usually chosen from the ranks of young men that they may sit at the feet of the older business men and learn.

"The accumulation of small things well done is the important thing for chambers of commerce," said Mr. Crockett; "the creating of friendships, bettering industrial conditions and enlarging the opportunities already at hand is but a blazing of the way for bigger things."

The work of the Postal Service Committee of the Rochester Chamber was touched upon by Mr. Crokett to show that hard work is often necessary to accomplish results. In certain business sections of Rochester it was found that mail was most unusually slow in reaching those sections. The correction was finally made through the efforts of the committee. The transportation committee likekwise worked out a difficult problem.

"By all means consult your local official before taking the matter farther," said Mr. Crockettt; "usually this person can assist you for the spirit of co-operation is more often uppermost."

The big thing to remember in Chamber of Commerce work, Mr. Crockett said in closing is that one can't do something for someone else without doing something for onesself. This the speaker stated had been demonstrated by the Rochester Chamber of Commerce.

Arbitration and counciliation; Bank and Currency; Barge Canal and Canal Harbor; Commercial and Industrial Education; Community Council; Conventions; Entertainment and Acquaintance; Fire Prevention; Good Roads; Industrial Development; Lower River and Charlotte Harbor; Manufacturing Trade; Membership; Monroe County Farm Bureau; Postal Facilities; Public Health; Retail Trade; Rochester Chamber Safety Council; Smoke Abatement; Sons of Members; Telephone and Telegraph; Transportation; Upper River Improvement; Wholesale Trade; Official Bulletin; Charities Solicitations.

COUNCIL OPPOSES SHOOTING RANGE

Mayor Would Have City Protected Against Possible Accidents

The Common Council met in regular monthly session at the City Hall last night. The auditing of bills and other routine business took up the greater part of the evening, but several other matters were discussed. Mayor Fox read a notice received from the State Board of Health ordering the city to build a new disposal plant for the sewage of the city. After much deliberation it was decided that a request should be made of the State Board to delay the erection of the plant until next year, as the amount needed had not been included in this year's budget and there is no money on hand to go ahead with the work.

The reports of the City Chamberlain, Commissioner of Charities and the City Sealer were read. Mr. Washburn's report stated among other facts that the city had a balance at present in the bank of $89,342.03.

The report of the Charities Commissioner stated a total of $523.61 distributed among the poor of the city last month and there were several parties in the report, according to some of the councilmen, who were able to suppotr themselves without any help from the city.

Sealer of Weights H. M. O'Brien reported a total of 1412 weights, measures, bottles and other containers sealed and accepted during the past month, and 193 were condemned.

City Attorney Fanning announced that the Josephine G. McCarthy claim against the city had been decided in favor of the city and that the Crandall and the Decker claims had been settled.

Attorney Betts of Syracuse appeared before the Council on behalf of C. M. Johnson, a farmer south of the town. Mr. Betts stated that in 1898 the village of Fulton through its three commissioners approached Mr. Johnson and asked for the water rights of his farm. Mr. Johnson gave the city an option on the water rights of his farm and sufficient land to erect a pumping station and stand-pipe should the city ever desire to do so, with a right of way to the public road through his property. The option in one section reads "sufficient land to erect a suitable pumping station," and in another section it reads "all the land necessary" to carry out the option. Mr. Betts said that Mr. Johnson has sold his farm and in conveying the title he has found that an absolute deed made by him in 1898, in which he meant to convey only the water rights, has conveyed to the city some forty acres of his land, including the water rights, for the sum of $500. Mr. Johnson is willing to give the city the water rights but he never intended to deed the city and land, according to Mr. Betts and he relied upon the words of the commissioners when he signed the deed. Mr. Betts asked relief for Mr. Johnson and a general discussion followed.

It was learned that Attorney F. G. Spencer drew up the deed and Mr. Spencer was located downtown. He appeared at the council meeting and stated the case as he understood it. He said that he had drawn the deed from the survey tendered him by the engineer who measured the property. He had no idea that it conveyed away any of Mr. Johnson's land and he said that he was sure that was not the intention of the city at that time.

Mayor Fox and two of the Councilmen expressed some doubt over the wording, "all the land needed." The Mayor taking this to signify that enough land was to be taken by the city to properly maintain the springs and keep them free of contamination. The wording of the option is such that different meanings can be construed and both the Mayor and Mr. Betts showed how their contentions might be correct.

City Attorney Fanning advised relief for Mr. Johnson, but he said the only medium would be a suit against the city. Mr. Betts said that was agreeable to him and accordingly action will probably be brought in the near future.

Bernard Buell appeared before the Council and asked permission to install a target in the City Hall for the purpose of revolver and rifle practice. The police and about twenty local men are interested in the project and they propose to buy the target and install it in the hall. It is mounted on castors and is three feet feet wide by six feet high. Mr. Buell submitted blue prints showing that the target is absolutely safe as far as its possible penetration is concerned, and he said that the idea was to allow only experienced marksmen to try their skill. He also stated that a 38 calibre revolver and a 22 calibre long rifle were the largest guns used.

Some of the councilmen were in favor of permitting the installation of the target while other expressed an opinion that an accident might occur which would cost the city money. Mayor Fox said that he did not approve of the target unless the installing parties gave a bond protecting the city in case of accident from stray bullets. After some discussion the matter was tabled until the next meeting.

Councilman Gardner moved that $525 be transferred from the excise fund to the poor fund and the motion was passed. $20 was appropriated for the Farmers' Institute and the quarterly appropriation of $375 was made for the Public Library.

CLASS EDUCATES BOY

The Delta Alphas Are Very Active —Their Work a Banner Winner.

The Delta Alpha class of the First Methodist church with Mrs. H. J. Wilson as teacher, had an Easter collection of $55. This was over one-fourth of the entire collection. Owing to the illness of Mrs. Wilson, Mrs. W. H. Patterson is the substitute teacher.

In addition to its work for the Easter time, this class is supporting a little heathen boy, and giving a generous sum toward the other extra church expenses.

Not Paint

The worst mistake in painting it not putting-off. That costs about 10 per cent.; you keep your money a year and pay 10 percent for it.

Paint would have to come-down 25 percent to make 10 percent on the job, for wages do not go-down.

The worst mistake is "cheap" paint. It costs from 50 percent to 100, first cost, and another in wear.

What a liar "cheap" is! "Put-off" is bad-enough; "Cheap" is ten times worse.

THE BOYS' MAN COMING TO TOWN

Scouts to Listen to the Champion of All Boys' Rights

John Boardman, who has done perhaps more than any other man for the youth of America, will make his first visit to Fulton Sunday. He will be heard at the First Baptist church in the morning and at the Sunday school in the afternoon at a conference of boy workers of the city. In the evening Mr. Boardman will speak at a union service of all the churches of the city which will be held in the First Methodist church. Mr. Boardman, during his stay in the city will be a guest of Rev. M. G. Buck, pastor of the First Baptist church, whose influence with Mr. Boardman is largely responsible for his visit to this city.

Mr. oBardman was ordained a Congregational minister, but took up work among the boys of the country shortly after his ordination. He was at one time, International Junior secretary of the Y. M. C. A., a position which brought him in contact with boys and young men from all parts of the globe. At present he is spending a year in re-organizing and spreading the Boy Scout movement and the meetings in this city are largely for that purpose.

The Boy Scouts of Fulton will hear Mr. oBardman at the First Methodist church Sunday night. They will meet at the First Baptist church at 7.30 o'clock and will proceed to the Methodist church in a body. Mr. Buck will be in charge of the services at the church. Mr. Boardman's address will describe the work and the possibilities of the Boy Scout movement.

MISUSE NEW POST OFFICE

Ink Splashers and Roller Skaters to Be Called to Account.

Since the opening of the new Federal building in this city there has been a disposition on the part of many foreigners, and a few Americans, to throw ink upon the floor and walls of the lobby. These people probably do not realize that there is a heavy penalty for defacing or multilating public buildings. The authorities at Washington, propose to put a stop to this practice, and have a representative here who will prosecute all offenders until the practice is abated.

Many children also have been using the lobby for a skating rink, thus incurring the liability of accidents to elderly and feeble people who may be unable to get out of the way of the skater. Hereafter no roller skating will be allowed in the lobby of the Post Office. All children should be instructed by their parents, it is advised, to discontinue this practice.

JUDGE WARNS W. SIDE POLACKS

Frank Gates Sent to Jail Upon Making Request in City Court

Frank Gates, charged with non-support and cruelty by his wife, was committed to the Oswego county jail yesterday afternoon by Judge Wilson. Gates married a colored woman and his actions in jail have led the police to believe that his mind is affected.

In making a plea of guilty, Gates stated that he wanted rest and freedom from marital cares for a time, and expressed a desire to be committed. Judge Wilson obliged him.

Another Polak row on the West Side culminated in police court yesterday afternoon. John Misiazek, as the complainant, averred that John Krupa and Joe Sabota had done him grievous wrongs, to wit: That Saboda had thrown a perfectly good watch on the floor, said watch being the property of the complainant, and that Krupa had added injury to insult by assaulting him. He swore out a warrant for the two men but when they were brought into court yesterday afternoon his heart softened and he was inclined to be lenient. On the promise of the defendants to pay for the watch and the costs of the trial, Judge Wilson allowed the men to go. Before he dismissed the case, however, the Judge warned the men that a repetition of the occurrence or any other trouble caused by the consumption of bad liquor by the Polak contingent on the West Side would mean a severe punishment for all parties concerned.

AN OPERATION TODAY

Miss Marion Little, 14, underwent an operation for appendicitis, this morning at the Lee Memorial hospital. Dr. Wallace of the Crouse-Irving hospital, Syracuse, performed the operation, assisted by Dr. Gladman. The young lady is reported to be doing very well.

Teacher Was Fooled.

"What is the German for lawyer, Tommy?" asked Miss Jones of my neighbor.

The German for lawyer is pronounced Abd-fo-kaht. Although Tommy and I had studied this lesson with great zeal the night before, we could not recollect the word. So Tommy stammered very sullenly:

"I fo'got."

"Good!" said Miss Jones, first to Tommy's astonishment, then to his amusement as he saw the point, and finally to his delight, because he avoided getting a zero.—Chicago Herald.

LOCAL PINNERS SCORE HIGH

Rear Was High Man With Total of 605 In Three Games

A change in the arrangements was made at the eleventh hours yesterday and the Baldwinsville bowling team appeared on the Onyx alleys last night instead of the match being rolled in Beeville. The change was a good omen for the local pinners as they walloped the visitors in all three games, totaling 2816 pins to Baldwinsville's 2605. The victory gives the local team a margin of 211 pins on the series thus far, which will mean a great deal to the locals when they journey to Beeville tomorrow night to battle again for the $25 purse.

Rear was high man for the locals with a total of 605 for three games. He improved as the games went on and in the last tilt he hit the wood for the high score of the night—229. Blake and Painter of the locals also reached the double century mark with 200 scores and Stauring rolled consistently in all three games.

Kiley of Beeville totaled 225 in the last game, but as a team the visitors rolled in poor form.

The Onyx men hope to repeat their performance at Baldwinsville tomorrow night and with the margin already earned to work on, their chances look very favorable.

As a preliminary, the Barbers and the Hunter Arms teams rolled three games. The Barbers led the procession at the finish with two out of three games. Seymour for the Barbers and Lewis for the Hunter team did good work.

Looked Sad For Papa.

William's uncle was a very tall, fine looking man, while his father was very small. William admired his uncle and wished to grow up like him. One day he said to his mother:

"Mama, how did uncle grow so big and tall?"

His mother said, "Well, when uncle was a small boy he was always a very good boy and tried to do what was right at all times, so God let him grow up big and tall."

William thought this over solemnly for a few minutes, then said, "Mama, what kind of a boy was papa?"—Pittsburgh Post.

There's Room at the Top.

He entered the barber shop, his self down, resigned to his fate.

The barber shaved him.

"Shampoo, sir?" asked the tonsorialist.

"No," replied the man, gazing at his bald dome in the reflective mirror; "shine."—Philadelphia Ledger.

FRATERNITY DANCE WAS ENJOYABLE AFFAIR

A very successful and pleasant dance was given last night in Church's hall under the auspices of the Pi Kappa Epsilon club of the Pathfinder boat club. About fifty couples enjoyed the modern dances from 9 o'clock until early this morning. An orchestra furnished the music for the program of twenty-four dances, and the orchestration, especiallf for the fox-trots, was novel and pleasing.

Refreshments consisting of ice cream, sandwiches and assorted cakes were served during the intermission. Guests were present from Syracuse, Oswego and Phoenix, as well as this city. Messrs. O'Brien, McCaffery and Lynch were in charge of the arrangements and they are to be congratulated on the success of the acair.

LEAVES HOUSE TO HER PETS.

Dead Woman's Dogs and Cats Occupy Home That Was Hers.

Elisabeth, N. J.—Occupying a house in Ashwood avenue, a company of dogs and cats, which were the pets of the late Mrs. Mary Rosaline Wright, will be allowed to enjoy undisturbed their present abode until they voluntarily seek another home. Such request is contained in the will of Mrs. Wright. Mrs. Wright's daughter, Mrs. Frederick C. Kelley, is named to see that the strange request is carried out.

In accordance with the dead woman's desires her late home is kept heated and the animals fed regularly. Mrs. Kelley said she hoped the animals would become sufficiently attached to her to make their abode at her house, which is only a short distance from the Wright homestead. Mrs. Wright was well known in this vicinity as a friend of dumb animals. With her husband, the late Seaman L. Wright, she lived for more than forty years in the old homestead.

DOG FINDS $1; TAKES IT HOME

Shep Is Honest, but Thinks Everything Belongs to His Master.

Muncie, Ind.—Edward Gottlieb of Muncie has a shepherd dog which for intelligence he believes cannot be surpassed. It is not unusual for the animal to bring home things that he finds in the streets, but the other day it surpassed all its previous endeavors by coming home with a brand new $1 bill in its mouth. It is said the dog picked up the money in South Walnut street, in the center of the business district. Mr. Gottlieb is now endeavoring to find the person that lost the money.

"Shep does not mean to be dishonest," said his owner, "but he thinks that everything of value he sees should belong to me."

Old Enough.

"I understand Miss Whatyoumaycall is going to have a birthday party this evening," the fat plumber observed.

"Yep," answered the thin carpenter. "I've been invited."

"Did she keep her last birthday?"

"Yes; and I'll tell you in confidence I don't believe she ever intends to let go of it."—St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

AUTO FRIGHTENED THE UMBECK HORSE YESTERDAY

A horse owned and driven by Mrs. S. D. Umbeck of Bowen's Corners, took fright at a passing automobile yesterday afternoon at the corner of Utica and 3d sts., and bolted. The horse dashed upon the lawn in front of Frank Woster's residence and then swinging around threw the buggy against the porch. Mrs. Umbeck, Mrs. Almon Rogers and Clinton Umbeck, occupants of the buggy, were thrown out with some force and received some painful bruises.

They were given first aid in the Woster home. The horse was caught before he had proceeded very far. The buggy was wrecked.

West Park, N. Y.—"I am never idle, but I don't think I'll ever idle because of overwork."

This is the way John Burroughs, naturalist, feels on his seventy-eighth birthday. He was seated before a blazing fire in his study, a rustic cottage above the Hudson. Except for the long rows of books which line the room, everything in sight was rustic and old-fashioned. The open fireplace savored of the New England farmhouse of hal fa century ago, and the piles of cordwood on either side testified to the energy of the venerable author in the easy chair.

"I built this place myself," he explained, "to say nothing of the house and barn. These evergreens I planted. I've been here for forty years, and I'm happy and healthy."

Mr. Burroughs returned to the subject of work. "You city people rush and run and toil hard enough, but it's all at the expense of the later years of life. You haven't the fresh air and food. The noise and speed are distracting to the nerves, and your geniuses never live as long as they might.

AGE TOO MECHANICAL

"Up here in the mountains, where there are plenty of birds and other of nature's creatures, I can do my work without interruption. I take care of my health and I feel as young as I did years ago. All my writing is done in the forenoons, as I walk and rest in the latter part of the day. I use my automobile to go to places which I would not otherwise visit, but I walk a great deal. In fact, I have every car but my own. When the tourists go by with their heads in the air, kicking up dust and forcing pedestrians to the side of the road, I feel that this age is getting too mechanical.

"Since this war started I appreciate more than ever the value of my secluded retreat. It has become a nightmare and often robs me of sleep. German militarism must be crushed. I love the Germans as a people, but the clique of advisers around the Kaiser has overturned the civilization of a century. Think of all those fine young men being sacrificed to the whims of a few high officials! It's too much for me.

"I believe that Germany was in a fair way to conquer the world by peace, for the scholars of that nation are unexcelled. But now she seeks to rule by force of arms. Why, if the German army was to come over here I would shoulder a musket, old as I am, and fight them myself."

The mention of Belgium softened the glow in the eyes of the patriarch. "The generosity of America to this stricken land is one of the finest examples of applied Christianity I have ever witnessed," he said. "We are doing a great work, and it speaks volumes for the United States that we have opened our hearts and our purses to these unfortunate widows and orphans. For them I feel the deepest sympathy.

"KULTUR" NOT ONLY THING

"There are other civilizations than the boasted 'Kultur,' and the sooner Germany recognizes the fact the better for the world. There are young men facing the cannon in Flanders who might some day become great figures in literature, science or the arts. Why should they be killed off because of a nation's claim of advanced 'Kultur'?"

The idea of war was evidently too terrible for the naturalist to discuss. "Let's get back to nature," he pleaded. "Isn't this a romantic spot? I've had some distinguished visitors here.

"Henry Ford, the manufacturer, calls on me from time to time. He is about the only multi-millionaire of his type. He frankly admits that he never made an effort to get rich, and now he's doing a great good with his wealth. He's a practical benefactor who believes in doing something worth while. The country needs a few more like him.

"Walt Whitman used to come here for a week's stay. He enjoyed the woods in his slow, quiet, easy-going way. We would plod around in the hills back from the river, making our headquarters at 'Slabsides,' my hermitage up the mountain. It is a little log cabin which I built myself. I go out there for a fortnight, cook my own food, sleep like a pioneer and live the life of a recluse.

"Another of my callers is Theodore Roosevelt. He has hunted enough to like the wilderness, and he likes to go back there with me and talk of the beauties of natural history. John Muir, the California mountain climber, who died in December, was also a favorite guest. He was a warm friend and an interesting companion. We spent many happy hours alone, and I was always benefited by the experience. I believe Muir worked himself to death, as he was a man of wonderful energy. He was like Balzac—he would stick to a task until it was finished, with little or no rest. With him a morning walk might develop into a trip to Mount Shasta, while his family and friends believed him lost. But he exhausted his physical resources by overdoing himself."

The naturalist turned to his hobby. "I never hunt any more, for I love all the creatures of the woods. About the only time I ever pull a trigger is when I go to Woodchuck Lodge, near here, to shoot those pests. But somehow or other the more I try to shoot the more there are of them. You see, they are very prolific and multiply very rapidly. In great quantities they are a nuisance like the rabbits in Australia."

HIS HUNTING DAYS OVER

The thought of killing seemed to bring a shudder to him. "But I never hunt," he continued, "and all the game I get is sent to me by friends. The squirrel and chipmunk are my friends, and they reconcile me to the rodent family in spite of the woodchuck. The birds are to me like members of my family. I go to Georgia every winter, and it is like meeting old friends to see the Northern birds down there.

"Forty years have made a great change. During the last few winters the cold has killed the quail, and Bob White's whistle is now no longer heard. The grouse is very hardy and still persists, in spite of the efforts of gunners and cold to exterminate him. He is about as enduring as any of our game birds."

The fire died down and the venerable naturalist in the great rustic easy chair cast a dinner silhouette on the booklined wall behind him. After a long silence he continued:

"This is the first time I have been interviewed in a long time. When I was in Georgia those imaginative young reporters certainly made me say a lot. They even had me prescribing a cannon's mouth for George Bernard Shaw. I was never that bloodthirsty. I think Shaw is a brilliant man, but not a great one. Like some of our Irish friends, he is 'agin the government.' He likes to oppose the populace and to take up the unpopular side of every controversy. By championing causes which the English detest he keeps in the public eye. He has no message to bring, no advice to give, and he feels no deep sympathy for human ills. Shaw lacks the great element of human brotherhood. And that's what it takes to be a great writer. One must love his work and have a sense of sympathy for his handicraft, his subject-matter and his readers. Happy is the man who has a task to keep him from idleness and who enjoys that task."

The Story of Captain Graham

By M. QUAD

Copyright, 1915, by the McClure Newspaper Syndicate.

We had called at Mauritius on our way from Liverpool to Bombay in the ship Farewell and were five days out from the island when the adventure occurred by which we lost the captain and laid the foundation for this story. He was swept overboard in the course of a heavy storm.

Almost before he realized his position the ship was a mile away, and he felt sure that no boat would be lowered to make a search for him. Having found a spar and lashed himself to it, he drifted away to the west and evening came on. Night passed and another day came, and toward the close of that day Captain Graham lost consciousness. He may have drifted a day after that—perhaps two days. When he came to his senses again he was lying on a sandy beach with his feet in the water. He had been cast ashore on an island.

Along the beach were oysters and shellfish a-plenty. What struck him curiously was the entire absence of life on the island. He had been on the island a week or so and had twice walked clear around it, when one day, as he was gathering fruit in an open spot, he was suddenly and fiercely attacked by a naked man. The surprise was great, and the captain had not yet recovered his strength; but, shaking the man off, he seized a club and laid about him so vigorously that his assailant ran away.

In breaking away from the captain he ran for the beach. The latter followed at his heels, shouting for him to stop, but the unknown ran to the water, plunged in and swam straight out to sea, looking back now and then and seeming to be in a terrible fright. He held to his course until he could no longer be seen, and there was no doubt he went to his death, as he did not return. In a dense thicket the captain found a rude shelter which the man had used, and among the dried grass forming his bed were a few fragments of cloth, which had once been a pea jacket. There were also a sailor's pipe and an empty tobacco box.

The center of the island was considerably higher than elsewhere, and exactly in the middle was a single tree, surrounded by a thicket, which the captain had never yet penetrated. In carrying out his explorations he entered this copse, finding a hard beaten path, evidently made by the crazy man. Piled up at the roots of the tree the captain found a great stock of small iron bound boxes, and it needed but one glance to satisfy him that they were treasure boxes. There was the cavity where they had once been buried, and the boxes were weather beaten, as if long exposed. Two or three large shells lay about, which had doubtless been used to dig out the dirt, and one of the boxes had been opened.

The captain shouldered this box and carried it down to the spot he called "home" and there inspected its contents. It contained about $6,000 in gold. In the pile at the foot of the tree were fifteen other boxes of the same size.

Well, there was a big fortune there, and it belonged to the finder, but it might have been so much sand for all the good it could do him. Days and weeks and months passed away, and one day the castaway counted up the pebbles he had laid in rows along the beach to mark the time and found he had been eleven months on the island. On that day there came a furious gale from the east and a very high tide, and from some wreck at sea the waves brought in a vast quantity of stuff. There was nothing to eat or wear among the wreckage, but there were planks and spars and a carpenter's tool chest, and as soon as the storm had abated the castaway went to work to build him a raft. He had determined to leave the island at any hazard, and after four or five days' work he had his raft completed. It was a rude but stout affair. Wild fruits were taken for provisions, and fresh water was carried in a wine keg which had come ashore with the wreckage. From one of the boxes the captain took $500 in gold pieces, and one morning when the wind was from the west he launched his raft and drifted off before it. By his reckoning, which was probably correct, it was seven days before he was picked up by the John J. Speed, an American merchant vessel, homeward bound.

Captain Graham at once set about finding a ship to bring the treasure off. A brig was finally chartered and sailed with him aboard, but after a cruise of months she failed to find the island.

In the space of two years he made three different voyages in search of the island, and when the story leaked out three or four other expeditions were fitted out, but in all the sailing to and fro no human eye could find the looked for spot. If it had been raised from the sea by a volcanic disturbance, had a second disturbance caused the sea to swallow it up? There are many reasons to believe that this was the fate which overtook it. About ten years after the captain's last voyage a volcanic island, which was simply a barren rock about a mile in circumference, was pushed above water where his island was supposed to be, and it is there today with a fringe of trees all around the outer edge. It has been searched inch by inch for treasure, but not a single gold piece has it yielded up.

WHAT "MOVIES" HAVE DONE.

Stimulated Growth of Suburbs and Dead Urban Sections.

Five years of the drama in films have given a most impressive example of the valuable support the development of the "movies" has given to real estate. Every afternoon and evening approximately 100,000,000 feet of moving picture films are unreeled for the entertainment of many millions of people who fill seats in more than 25,000 theaters in the United States alone. In all probability the capital invested in such enterprises would aggregate close to $500,000,000.

For New York and other large cities, where the moving picture industry is deeply rooted, these enterprises have done the service of converting many vacant lots, former dumping grounds, into income payers and in not a few instances helped to restore the life of many moribund theaters, now combined vaudeville and picture playhouses, that make easy for their owners the payment of taxes and interest on the realty they occupy.

One of the features of the moving picture theaters, owing to their inexpensive admissions, is that they will thrive in districts which could not support a legitimate theater. Therefore because of this many properties in the suburbs and in the outskirts of cities have been utilized which but for the picture theaters would doubtless be untenanted.

Grim Comedy.

A certain young actress was constantly irritated by the pompous behavior of the actor-manager in whose company she was playing.

"Now, Miss Blank," said the great one, "you'll have an opportunity to show your talents in another direction. I've cast you for a dandy part, small, but 'fat.' And you'll have a chance to study me in a new role. You've never seen me do farce comedy, have you?"

"Yes, I have," contradicted Miss Blank; "I've seen your Macbeth."—London Mail.

Wire Drag Reveals Mountain in Sea

By Victor Elliott

With the apex only 17 feet below the surface of the sea, there is rock 600 feet tall in the waters off southeastern Alaska.

The discovery of this hidden menace to navigation is a striking example of the value of "wire drag" conducted by the United States Geodetic Survey.

Henceforth it will be possible for navigators in Alaskan waters to avoid this particular pyramid of destruction. The power of a mass of ice a hundred feet in depth was made known to the world when the Titanic was ripped from stem to stern in the most impressive tradegy of the sea.

There is some "give to ice, but none at all to the mountain of solid stone. Experts are loud in their praise of the work of the Geodetic Survey in locating and charting this "ship destroyer of the first order."

The wire drag survey, through which the discovery was made, is a simple contrivance which lowers a long wire from the stern of a vessel and which may be towed along at any depth.

The ship steams at the rate of from one to two miles an hour, and the action of a buoy indicates the discovery of an obstacle.

Geodetic experts have found that this method is infinitely superior to the old plumb line way.

This is especially true in Alaskan waters, where the hidden rocks pyramid to a point, and the plumb line slides down the side.

Since 1906 the wire drag method has found 3,000 rocks along the Atlantic coast that were covered with less water than the depth given on the old charts. Nearly 900 of these were positive menaces to navigation.

An appropriation of $200,000, according to Government experts, would change the long and jagged Alaskan coasts from an ocean graveyard to a haven.

There have been 27 preventable wrecks up there since 1905, of which two alone cost twice the sum that would have prevented most of them, if not all.

On May 20, 1912, the America went down and the loss to her owners was $175,000.

On August 17, 1913, the State of California was sent to a watery grave by the hidden rocks of Alaskan waters. Thirty-one lives and $350,000 was the tribute paid to one of the unseen terrors of the deep.

The five leading steamship companies operating in Alaskan waters joined Secretary Redfield in asking Congress for an adequate appropriation, and several months ago, after the needless loss of one of its largest ships, one of the companies announced that another of the same type would be withdrawn from a certain route, which has great need for its services.

Congress, however, was not impressed, and refused to provide more than $25,000 for the wire drag work of the Geodetic Survey. Two hundred thousand dollars is the amount needed, experts insist, to do the work as it should be done.

Secretary Redfield summed up the situation in very pointed style, according to his supporters, when he observed:

"The plan of discovering hidden rocks by running vessels on them is still in vogue."

About Sports Generally

Now that Pete Noonan of the Barons has decided to bring back Rube DeGroff, it wouldn't be a bad idea for him to re-engage Hobe Ferris for second, send for Billy Keister for right field, and hire Bill Bergen for catcher. "Pete" would then have a quartette of baseball relics.

The early squirm of the ambitious worm catches the trout. Fishermen with abated breath and abaited hook have begun their annual game of hide and seek with the speckled beauties.

Many of the scribes around the circuit are worrying for fear the Bingos wil not be able to survive the loss of Peterson, Curtis and Konnick.

The contract of Francisco Lujan with Binghamton has been approved by Secretary Farrell of the N. A. of P. B. B. L.

Some of the highp riced players are just beginning to realize that when the National Association fixes a salary limit it stays fixed.

"Jap" Doremus, an amateur pitcher in Lancaster county, has been sent a contract by Pete Noonan, manager of the Wilkes-Barre team, and it is understood he will sign.

Manager Bill Coughlin of the Miners has offered Outfielder Cooper to Elmira in exchange for Pitcher Caporel. The deal has not been closed.

"I KNEW THAT I COULD WIN"

By "Jess Willard"

"I have never felt for a moment that the result would be other than successful for men. For months I have been perfecting my boxing science, knowing that in Johnson I was going against the master of that art. I followed my own ideas throughout the twenty-six rounds today and knew all the time that it was only necessary for me to fight with extreme care in the early stages, or until I found just what Johnson posessed.

"I quickly decided that his blows lacked steam. I do not believe I felt one of his punches excepting momentarily. He tried all his famous blows right at the outset, but they never feased me. I was not even jarred by any one of them. This came as a surprise, but afterward gave me just the confidence I needed.

"I never hurried, but waited patintly until he had worn himself out trying to put me away, and then I turned loose all my strength in that one right hand swing—the blow I knew that would win me the championship.

"I want to say for Johnson that I never have fought a cleaner man. Not once did he resort to foul tactics, but on the contrary he tried always to make it a good, clean fight. He has been the most criticised champion that ever lived, but I certainly found him a white man in the ring.

MONEY FOR WORK NONE TO WASTE

No Attempt Made to Interfere With Efficiency; To Make Show of Economy

Albany, April 7.—Three months is a short time in which to produce results, but the state administration has done enough along that line to give the man who pays taxes something to think about.

In the fist two months of 1915, State Engineer Williams paid out for engineering expenses under the $101,000,000 barge canal project, $110,297.57 as compared with $176,984.90 paid out for the same purpose by his predecessor during thec orresponding two months of 1914. This is a saving of over $33,000 a month and the state engineer promises that these expenses for the year 1915 shall not exceed an average of $90,000 a month. Last year they averaged $91,000 a month.

Gen. W. W. Weatherspoon, superintendent of public works during the first three months of 1915 spent $80,398 for the maintenance of canals while for the corresponding three months of 1914, his predecessor spent $121,000 for the same purpose, amount to half as much as he has spent. Without making any predictions he says he does not expect to spend any more money than is necessary.

Secretary of State Hugo in the first three months of his term has dropped twenty emwployes reducing his annual payroll by $30,000. Incidentally this is the first year in the history of the automobile bureau in his department when all automobile license plates were ready on time obviating the necessity of granting to holders of old licenses an extension of time.

Pruning the Highway Payroll

Commissioner Duffey of the Highway department has abolished one unnecessary bureau at a saving of $18,000 in salaries and made a further cut in his payroll of $8.00 and he has been in office only about a month.

Superintendent Storrs of the Department of Public buildings during his first month in office cut his expense $2,200 and while doing it put the capitol in a condition of cleanliness that it has not known in three years.

Adjutant General Stotesbury begins the second quarter of the calendar year with his force reduced by eight.

These few instances do not cover the record of accomplishment of the present administration up to date by any means, but as straws show which way the wind blows, the work of these departments shows the trend of the new regime.

No Interference with Efficiency

The honest and efficient transaction of public business is accepted by every department head taking office under the new administration as his first duty to the state. No attempt is being made to interfere with efficiency to make a show of economy. Savings in payroll and other expenditures are not being made where the prompt transaction of public business dictates otherwise.

Comptroller Travis as a result of analytical examination of the various state departments has recommended to the appropriations committee of the Legislature reductions which will aggregate more than a million dollars. The comptroller's examinations began immediately upon his taking office and they will be continued until every one of the state departments has undergone a critical analysis. his work is being done by the regular force in the comptroller's office without the requirement of any additional appropriation.

The standard of appointments made by Governor Whitman is unusually high. When the board of claims which was three years behind with its work was succeeded by the present court of claims the governor appointed as Judges Adolph J. Rodenbeck, a former judge of the court of claims, Thomas F. Fennell, former deputy secretary of state and Fred M. Ackerwon of Niagara Falls, all lawyers of excellent standing.

The department of pubic works has at its head Gen. W. W. Wotherspoon formery of the United States army.

The appointees to the state civil service commission are Samuel H. Ordway, chairman of the executive committee of the state civil service reform association; William Gorham Rice, a United States civil service commissioner under President William D. McKinley; Charles S. Kinstry, a former civil service commissioner and one of the representative newspaper editors of the state.

Charles S. Wilson, professor in the state college of agriculture at Cornell university, who has been appointed to succeed Calvin J. Huson as the head of the agricultural department brings with him to his new work a strong endorsement of President Schurman of Cornell.

Col. William Hayward, who succeeds Milo Maltbie as public service commissioner, is a former assistant district attorney of New York county and a lawyer of great energy and ability. In connection with his appointment it is worthy of note that it took him only a few days to discover the cause of the disastrous subway fire in New York city after the public service had devoted more than a month to an investigation of the ire without result.

RUNNING UPSTAIRS.

Physical Energy It Expends Quoted in Horsepower.

To lift 550 pounds one foot in one second requires what is known as one horsepower. Similarly a horsepower is able to raise twice that weight one foot in twice the time, or one-half foot in just that time. Moreover, it can raise half 550 pounds one foot in half a second, or two feet in a second, and so on. Therefore when we lift one-fourth of that weight, 137½ pounds, four feet in one second, we are exerting a horsepower.

Accordingly, when a person who weighs 137½ pounds runs upstairs at the rate of four feet a second, he is exerting the equivalent of a horsepower. For a man weighing twice that much, 275 pounds, it would be necessary to climb at the rate of only two feet a second to exert a horsepower. It is possible to do much more.

As a matter of fact, a horse often exerts many times a horsepower. The average horse can draw a wagon up a hill where a ten horsepower engine with the same load would fail. A horse power does not represent the greatest momentary strength of the average horse, but is a measure of the power which he can exert continuously.—New York World.

A Short Memory.

Uncle Jed was a trifle slack about quitting the bottom when the levee broke and had to take to a tree. Morning came and there was sixty feet of Mississippi flood water between him and shore. The preacher happened along on the high ground and saw Jed, but there wasn't any boat. Moreover, Jed's suspicion that there were alligators about was well founded.

The preacher besought Jed to swim, but in vain. Finally he called out:

"Jed, have faith. Remember how Jonah was cared for in the whale and saved after three days."

Jed spoke earnestly.

"Yas, suh, I remember. I ain' denyin' nuthin' 'bout Jonah, 'cause I wa'n't nigh um. But dis year alligator, he ain' no whale, suh. Alligator, he eat a nigger an' go off an' sleep a week, suh, an' disremember all 'bout dat nigger inside um."—New York Post.

Celebrated Dwarfs.

Early in the eighteenth century a brother and sister attracted great attention for smallness of stature. They were of Polish birth and were people of great accomplishments and elegant manners. When the brother, Count Berowlaski, was one year old he measured fourteen inches in height. Five years after he had gained but three inches, but at the age of twenty the measurement was six inches more, and then the growth ceased. The sister, Anastasia, seven years younger, could stand under her brother's arm. The count lived over ninety years.

Art Criticism.

"This artist," remarked the teacher at the conclusion of the drawing lesson, "painted many other beautiful pictures, which were hung in the galleries of Paris. Now I want you little boys and girls to write me a composition about this great painter."

One of said little boys wrote, "The artist painted many beautiful pictures, for which he was hung on the gallows in Paris."—Chicago Herald.

"YOU QUIT KIDDIN'," SAYS GIRL TO PRESIDENT.

Miss Mary Tumulty, eldest daughter of the president's secretary, was thirteen years old March 25. That night the Tumulty telephone rang, and Miss Mary was called. When she said "Hello!" a voice on the other end of the wire replied:

"This is President Wilson. I want to congratulate you on your birthday."

"You quit kiddin'," said Miss Mary. "You can't fool me."

"Why, this is the president," the voice replied. "I trust you do not object to me calling you on the phone. I merely wanted to congratulate you."

Mr. Tumulty appeared and immediately assured his daughter she was not being "kidded," but was really talking with the president of the United States, and then Miss Mary dropped the receiver, trembling.

MINE SWEEPERS SHOW CONTEMPT FOR PERIL.

A young American who recently signed for service as a member of the crew of a mine sweeper sends the following account of one of his trips out into the North sea:

"'Order—You proceed at once to —— and will sweep the area marked on the accompanying chart.' This was the order which sent us hammering into the head seas of a lively wind on a bitterly cold Sunday morning at 4 o'clock. It takes a tight vessel to survive the welter and smother which rise so quickly in these waters. In the winter months, especially, the work goes on amid conditions of great severity, and our ships frequently keep the sea as mine sweepers when as trawlers they would flee to the shelter of their harbors.

"Our ship is one of the best of her stanch type, and she reeled along wonderfully on that Sunday morning. Somewhere in the darkness to starboard there showed through the whirling snow the lights of another vessel running on the same course as ourselves, and at the same speed. The dawn came up and showed her to be kin to us and the signals at once made clear that in her we beheld our sweeping partner. There arises a curious respect for her. She must know quite well that at any moment her plunging bows may meet a mine and then there would be a vacancy at her end of the drag tackle and vacancies in little cottages in the isles.

"Fifteen hours of drenching and buffeting were our portion that day. The vessel, with the pull of the tackle and the drive of her engines keeping her down like a half tide rock, was never clear of the sweeping seas: Thud, slap, crash, swish, they came over her bows and swirled along the deck, never ceasing their constant assault.

"When the snow passed there was a glimpse of sun. Then the wind backed against the sun and came down on us in wild gusts, icy cold. As the afternoon wore on the cold increased, and just before nightfall came a strange lull which let in biting frost. The hardy fellows on board were stiff and numb before the day was done, and when the gear was slipped and shipped nobody was sorry.

"The disposal of the mines recovered depends upon their character and the circumstances of their recovery. Frequently our gunners explode them by firing into them from the deck."

VETERAN TIRED OF WAR.

It's No Profession For Gentlemen, Declares Major Johnson.

Major C. Page Johnson, a retired officer of the United States army and a veteran of Indian and the Spanish-American war, who returned from Europe on the Holland-American liner Nieuw Amsterdam, said that the war was such awful slaughter on both sides that the government at Washington ought to take steps to stop it for the cause of humanity.

"Once war was a profession for gentlemen," the major said, "but now it is not a profession, but a business for slaughterers. Along the battle front 3,000,000 men have been drawn up facing each other since the fall and will remain under the severe tension until May. Murderous machines are dealing death to thousands daily of both armies in the field. Germany is formidable in the faith of her people that her cause is just. Her women are brave and show wonderful spirit. It is difficult to foretell what the end of the conflict will be."

POPULATION OF BERLIN.

Said to Have Dropped Below the 2,000,000 Mark.

In consequence of the war the population of Berlin (exclusive of the suburban towns) has again dropped below he 2,000,000 mark, which it had crossed several years ago. The population at the beginning of January was returned at 1,982,154, which signifies a loss of 97,000 for the year.

This loss, however, does not take account of the men who have gone into the war, who are still counted as if present; it seems to be due mostly to the removal of working people to the suburbs and to more distant districts.

KNOW THYSELF.

It is of dangerous consequence to represent to man how near he is to the level of beasts without showing him at the same time his greatness. It is likewise dangerous to let him see his greatness without his meanness. It is more dangerous yet to leave him ignorant of either, but very beneficial that he should be made sensible of both.—Pascal.

The Earliest Artillery.

We think the eighteen inch artillery as distinctly modern. Yet the first cannon ever taken into the field were of that caliber. A crude mortar was fired at the battle of Crecy, fought in 1346. The early cannon balls were chisled from stone, and the projectile, which fits the ancient mortar, is made of solid granite. Two powerful men could scarcely lift it. These ancient projectiles remained in use for a surprisingly long time, for it is recorded that in 1807 a British man of war engaged against the Turks had her mainmast severed by a 700 pound stone shot from a Turkish battery.—American Boy.

French Begin Furious Drive, to Break German Arrow That Points From Metz to River Meuse

Desperate Fighting Occurs North East of Virdun and Perthes

London, April 8.—The last three weeks have shown kaleidoscopic changes in the centers of the war interest. The dial has revolved for glimpses of the Dardanelles, Neuve Chapelle, East Prussia, St. Eloi, Champagne, the Carpathians, and yesterday brought the forest region between the Meuse and the Moselle into the focus. Here, for the second time since the first of the year, the French have launched a big offensive to capture St. Mihiel and lift the partial investment of Verdun.

Dispatches from the front last night indicated that General Joffre has ordered the most pretentious operations since the drive that began two months ago against the Germans at Perthes and Beausejour, on the western slope of the Argonne. Enormous numbers of field and heavy artillery have been sent tothe heights of the Meuse and the wooded region between the river and Pont-a-Mousson, with the object of cutting off or bunting the "arrow pointed at the heart of France."

* * *

The arrow synonym has become popular with the military writers to describe the German position at St. Mihiel. There, a little town nestling between cliffs that arise on three sides on the eastern banks of the Meuse, the Germans have maintained themselves since October with a comparatively narrow line of communications, stretching nearly forty miles away to Metz. Rather than an arrow, however, the German-controlled territory resembles more a sharp triangle, with St. Mihiel at its apex, and the sides stretching east past Pont-a-Mousson to Metz and northeast, within eight miles of Vedun, to Etaoin, where it becomes part of the main line of entrenchments that ends north of Nieuport, on the North sea.

Early in the winter the French made strong efforts either to dislodge the Germans at St. Mihiel or to cut their line. The latter alternative was attempted from the shelter of the Apremont Forest and from Pont-a-Mousson, on the south, and in the neighborhood of Les Eparges, from the Verdun side of the triangle. Considerable ground was gained, but big German reinforcements were sent into the sector and, after more than a week of sharp fighting, the armies resumed their trench warfare. The most pronounced success by the French at the timewas the dislodging of the Germans from Chauvoncourt directly across from St. Mihiel, and the only point they had occupied on the left bank of the Meuse.

Late last night the War Office in Berlin issued the following account of the operations:

"When the enemy's infantry began to deploy, the German outposts retreated, according to a prearranged plan, from Regnieville and Fen-en-Haye to their main position, on Easter Monday.

"The French attack against the southern front, at first to the north of Toul and then in the Forest of Le Pretre, began simultaneously with attacks against our north wing, to the south of the Orne and between Les Eparges and Combres, but the French nowhere were successful, they being everywhere thrown back.

"The severest fighting took place between the Meuse and Apremont, where, in the wooded country, the French were able to approach close to the German positions, but were received with an annihilating fire at short range.

"The Germans served their guns with tremendous effect, and soon the French reserves were in full flight, while their rifle attack broke down under our infantry fire.

"On April 6 we observed the French piling hundreds of dead in front of their position.

"The same day attacks by the French in the Forest of Le Pretre and near Flirey failed. So far the French have only to record fresh failures on the ground which has been the scene of repated struggles, but it seems that their attacks are not yet at an end."

The announcement made in Paris and received in London this morning follows:

"The very unfavorable weather continues; nevertheless, activity has been pronounced between the Meuse and the Moselle, where we have maintained all our gains and made further advances.

"Near Parei, east of Verdun, we have taken two lines of trenches. On Tuesday night at Les Epargus we made an important advance.

"All today the Germans were engaged in violent counter attacks, but they regained nothing. Their last attack was particularly heavy, but they were mowed down by our fire.

"The same thing occurred in Ailly Wood. After several counter attacks, all of which were repulsed, we remained masters of the position which we gained yesterday. On this part of the front we captured numerousp risoners."

The Belgians have gained a bit of ground they lost in Flanders at Drie Gratchen, but elsewhere there has been no change on the western front.

The Carpathian Mountains continue to be the scene of most sanguinary engagements, but little or no news is forthcoming of the progress of the battles.

Except in the Uzok Pass, where the Austrians, assisted by Germans, are offering a most stubborn resistance, the Russians are said to have crossed the first range of mountains, and from the heights which they have taken from the Austrians in bitter hand-to-hand fighting can look down the southern slopes toward the plains of Hungary. It is asserted that part of the army which has crossed the mountains is manoeuvring to get behind the Austro-Germans holding the Uzok Pass.

The Austrians admit things are going bad with their armies and are anxiously awaiting German reinforcements, which are being hurried to their aid. The Austrians also are fighting in Bukowina, but this is only a secondary operation. The engagements in progress in Northern Poland, where the Russians are trying to push back the Germans into East Prussia, also appear to be small affairs.

Although no announcement to this effect has been made, the general expectation in military circles here is that a combined land and sea attack on the Dardanelles will begin soon and that at the same time the Russians, who now apparently are in command in the Black sea, will bombard the Bosphorus forts.

Field Marshal von der Goltz, the German commander in Turkey, has written a letter to the Vienna Ereie Presse regarding the operations at the Darnalles. A copy of the letter has been received and reads:

"How the great fight between the allied fleet and the land batteries will end cannot be predicted at present, but we can say that all pessimistic prophecies have been silenced.

"All preparations for the prosecution of the war in Turkey were crrid out as fully as the means at our disposal would permit. Turkey is cut off from all sources of supply from her allies and must rely on her own resources. Perhaps the largest number of men the Ottoman Empire ever called up have been brought to the colors. Their arms and equipment were not abundant, and it was only possible to equip them by practicing the greatest economy. If everything is not at its best, the limitation of our means and the shortness of the time for preparations must be taken into account.

"On the whole, the results of the Turkish war thus far have been satisfactory. The Turks have not gained successes everywhere, but no decision has yet been reached. They are holding up a strong fleet in the Dardanelles and a strong army in the Caucasus and are theatening Egypt."

In Africa General Botha's Union of South Africa forces continue their victorious march along the railways, but thus far have been unable to overtake the main German army, which, it is thought here, is trying to draw the old Boer general as far from his base as possible before making a stand.

In England the drink question is still uppermost in the minds of the people. The Cabinet met yesterday to discuss what governmental action should be taken in the premises, but did not reach any decision. eMantime hundreds of public men are following the King's example and are banishing alcoholic liquors from their households, while the churches are making a plea to the people that they at least take the pledge to abstain from liquor until the war is over.

INDEPENDENCE

When and Where Does It Really Exist? By Earning a Living in Fulton, Do You Not Owe to the Community Something?

"The business man who imagines that he can live independently of the activities of his fellow-citizens, is indulging in costly self-deception. Every civilized man is dependent upon others. The retailer needs customers; the lawyer, clients; the doctor, patients; the manufacturer, labor; the workingman, employment. Even the thief needs a victim, and the snob the gapping crowd. Absolute independence is a thing we may prate about, but which does not exist.

"Every citizen owes something to his home community. It is doing something for each—furnishing business or employment, providing friends and entertainment, schools and churches, drives and parks, contact with the outside world. Most of these things come along in so matter of fact a way that we are almost unconscious of them. Yet each of these need the co-operation of many men for its complete accomplishment, and each is better done the better that co-operation.

"True co-operation is not simply giving. It is giving in a way that enables all to work together in the accomplishment of a common purpose. The modern Chamber of Commerce scientifically organized and directed is the medium through which genuine co-operation is made possible."

T. M. RIPLEY TO SPEAK AT CLUB DINNER

The officers and directors of the Fulton Automobile Club met last night at the VanWagenen, Inc., office, R. L. McCully presiding. Plans were madef or the first meeting of the club for the season and it was decided to have an informal supper at the City Hall some time this month. Although attempts are being made to get Lucius Wilson of the American City Bureau a speaker at the supper it d[illegible] seem likely at present that h[illegible] will be able to get here. The [illegible] is also arranging with T. M. Ripley, formerly barge canal engineer, and who is now superintending the const[illegible]ction of roads. Mr. Ripley will address the club on "The Construction of State Roads in the Adirondacks."

The club decided to offer a reward for the arrest and conviction of any person throwing sharp substances into the city streets.

The date of the first road run of the has not been set, but is is probable that the the members will go to Cicero where a dinner will be served.

LEAGUE TO MEET

The Woman's Civic League will meet tomorrow afternoon with Mrs. L. P. Smith, 805 Oneida st., at 3.30 o'clock.

Two papers, one dealing with Industrial Education and the other with the proposed Cannery Bill will be discussed.

A short musical program has been arranged.

FUN RAYS

By Ray I. Hoppman

THE DOG.

Be it setter, hound or collie, dachshund, bull or St. Bernard, he will stick to you, by golly, for he is a faithful pard. He may be a ragged mongrel or a dog aristocrat, but he never will desert you—paste this precept in your hat. You may be a reckless outlaw with a price upon your head, you may be a humble beggar, asking alms and begging bread; you may be a lowly teller, yet a multi-millionaire wouldn't separate him from you by the width of a hair. He will love the starving master as he loves the rich with dough, for there is no class distinction with the canine crew, you know. You could feed him on a thistle, but your side he'd not forsake, though a porterhouse should tempt him with a juicy slice of steak. Should your coin wad be depleted, should your troubles reach the sky, yet you always would be greeted with the lovelight in his eye. He will share your tribulations with the calmness of a sage, he will ever dog your footsteps till he falters from old age. We have lots to learn, my shipmate, from this loyal quadruped, for he's got some things we lack, pard, sticking in that canine head. I have yet to see the canine with a stationary tail—I have yet to find the dog, friend, whose manhood would ever pale. Yes, it's hats off to the canine, be he doubly pedigreed—winner of a hundred trophies—or a dog of lowly breed. If you want the kind of friendship that will never slig a cog, get a wagging tail kyoodle, get a faithful, barking dog.

THE QUIRK

Today is offered that sterling little favorite, Mabel Tallaferro, in the Selig three-reel masterpiece, "Cinderella." This production is one that should appeal to all ages, as the title has been before the public eye for many years. Tomorrow Mr. Francis X. Bushman is featured in the thrilling three-act drama, "The Accounting." It is not necessary to dwell upon the merits of the photoplay, or Mr. Bushman, as both are always of the highest order. Three other reels will be shown each day, completing a six-reel show.

MAKES IMPROVEMENT

A. B. Lamont has installed a strictly up-to-date equipment in his milk house at 705 Fay st. It includes a boiler sterilizer, turbine bottle washer, large washing and rinsing vats, a turbine cream separator, and a bottling machine. This makes Mr. Lamont's milk house, which is well lighted and well drained, one of the most sanitary in this section.

BEGINNING AT THE ROOT

Following the report made by this publication in regard to a recent raid made in this city by the police and the subsequent arrest of two girls as a result brought a deluge of communications, some of which found their way into print.

The following article is pertinent to the question as to where the clear-up of the situation should begin. It reads as follows:

The strong antagonism of the vicious interests toward equal suffrage is notorious. Have they solid reason to fear it?

Let it be freely granted that neither equal suffrage nor any other single good measure can put a speedy end to the social evil. But vicious conditions can be encouraged or discouraged by law, and by its more or less honest enforcement. What has woman suffrage actually done along this line?

One of its finest achievements has been the passage of the red-light injunction and abatement law in California. This is considered by social experts the most effective legislation yet devised for dealing with the problem.

Instead of continually arresting and fining women of bad character, which has always proved fruitless, its puts the penalty upon the owner of the building which is used for improper purposes, and makes it unprofitable to rent property for such uses.

The law was bitterly fought by all the traders in vice. Under the California constitution, a law that has passed the Legislature may have its operation held up until a popular referendum can be taken upon it, if this is demanded by a petition of a certain size. The vicious interests secured such a petition. It is significant that only six per cent. of the names signed to it were those of women. The question was put to popular vote, and the popular vote sustained the red-light injunction and abatement law. Both the friends and the enemies of the law attribute this result to the women.

It is especially noteworthy that this advanced moral legislation should have been adopted in such a State as California, a gay and easy-going commonwealth where men largely outnumber women, and where the standards set in the early days by a roving bachelor population still linger.

In addition, since women in California got the ballot, a stringent white-slave law has been passed, the penalty for rape has been raised, the father as well as the mother of an illegitimate child has been made legally liable for its support and education, and a health certificate is required of the bridegroom before a marriage license can be issued.

POTATOES AS STOCK FEED

If the present overplus of potatoes in the hands of the farmers can not be disposed of for human food, they may be fed to farm animals, according to the authorities of the New York State college of agriculture at Cornell. They point out that potatoes alone can not be used to advantage as a feed, nor can they be fed in any great quantity. Potatoes have not been used to a great extent as a stock feed in this country, according to Professor J. L. Stone of the Cornell experiment station, and there is, for that reason, but little information on the subject of feeding potatoes to live stock. In Germany, however, the question has been studied, and the conclusion arrived at there is that they may be used in feeding cows, horses, sheep and pigs.

Potatoes are said to be best adapted to hog feed, but to secure the best results they should be cooked and should then be mixed with corn meal or other ground grains to form a thick mush. Skimmed milk, added to this feed, makes it more valuable. Potatoes have less than one-fourth of the feeding value of corn meal. If their cost is as low as fifteen cents a bushel, they are still more expensive than silage; yet fifteen cents a bushel for potatoes is said to represent a considerable loss to the farmer who can scarcely produce them, according to crop experts, for less than thirty cents. Still, it is pointed out that it is better to get this much value out of them than to have them a total loss.

Professor stone points out that potatoes add succulence to a feeding ration where corn silage is not available, and that some succulent food is desirable in all rations. Even as small an amount as half a peck a day fed to dairy cows where no other succulent food is used will produce a marked effect in increasing the milk flow, and a peck or more a day may be fed to advantage. They should, however, be introduced in the ration gradually, and should be run through a root cutter in order to avoid a risk of choking the animal.

DIRT AND DEATH

"Public health is purchasable," is the slogan of the State Department of Health. "How are we going to purchase it," may be asked the department. The oustanding theme which runs through all that the department writes and speaks—the keynote of all literature on health, conservation whether public or private is, to put it baldly: "Clean up and keep clean."

The reason that men live longer today than they did a century and more ago is because they are cleaner. If deceased horses, dogs and cats were left to rot in the streets, if cities were without sewers and the people drank the water which they obtained out of wells; if flies were not swatted and screened out, and if women were not so particular about "making things look decent," the death rate would be as high as it used to be and the average length of life would be short, as it used to be. A feature of the Middle Ages was dirt and filth and right along with it went disease and death.

As the members of the human race, both in their community and in their personal habits, became cleaner, life became sweeter and longer.

There is a strong sentiment the world over to the effect that the way to fight disease is not through drugs but through clean air, clean water and clean food; and the only way to get these is to keep the city and the human body clean.

The shortest distance known to the sanitary expert is between the hand and the mouth, so, above all things, it is necessary to keep the hands clean, particularly before eating.

The story of "Typhoid Mary," the human carrier of typhoid fever, stands out as an illustration of how unclean habits may transmit diseases. There is just one way that typhoid may be transmitted from one person to another and that is through the wastes of the body. "Typhoid Mary" is a cook who has been responsible for a number of typhoid epidemics, the last one being in a maternity hospital where she became cook under an assumed name. Twenty-five persons were attacked by the disease. Mary Mallon is by no means dull, yet she doesn't use soap and water when she ought to.

Three per cent. of those who have typhoid fever become typhoid carriers, though most of them are not cooks, and are not so virulent as Mary. In 1913 over 15,000 persons in the United States died of typhoid, not to mention the 200,000 who recovered. Cleanliness is the great preventive. And it is as effective against other diseases as it is against typhoid.

Still, what a long way the race can go in this business of cleaning up and staying clean! In boarding houses one may see men stabbing into the common plate with fork and women fingering over the bread with their hands. Cities have streets without sewers and with flies aplenty. Though a person would die if he were deprived of air for a few moments, people sleep in closed rooms, consequently they have only a part of an air supply, the rest of the space being occupied by "air" with the oxygen breathed out of it. One could write pages describing unclean habits of communities and persons, which bring sickness and often death.—Utica Observer.

Opinions

"MINDING YOUR OWN BUSINESS"

The man who, expending his energies wholly on private affairs, refuses to take part in public affairs, pluming himself on his wisdom in minding his own business, is blind to the fact that his own business is made possible only by the prosperity of all—Herbert Spencer.

To Preserve as Well as to Improve.

"All men are endowed by their Creator with inalienable rights. Governments are instituted to secure these rights."

As against the theory held by ancient republics that the only rights individuals possessed were those granted to them by the State—a theory which finds some support from shallow-thinking persons in this country and in this day—Mr. Elihu Root cites the nation's Declaration of Independence. Here is the foundation principle of the Republic and of American government.

"To preserve as well as to improve" is the motto Mr. Root would have the members of the Constitutional Convention adopt. Evidently Mr. Root has no patience with the unthinking element of the proletariat which goes about crying out that representative government is "on trial." The existence of this Republic, its success in weathering storms that would have wrecked any other nation, its steady growth and certain growth to greatness, the splendid stability of its institutions—these facts answer that cry. Representative government has proved itself; if it has failed to cure all the defects of human nature it is because it is not government's business to make over man.

"To preserve as well as to improve"—to preserve to its citizens their inalienable rights and to improve the machinery for accomplishing this end wherever improvement is necessary—this is the duty of the men who have been called upon by the citizens of New York to determine what, if any, changes shall be made in the fundamental law of the State. In the twenty-one years that have elapsed since the last constitutional convention completed its work life in this country and in this State has become more complex. The problem confronting the constitution makers is to see that the machinery of government is adjusted to meet these complexities.

"The personnel of the convention is a satisfactory guaranty to the people of New York that the adjustment will be made without sacrifice of any of the great principles upon which this representative government is founded.—New York Herald.

Using the Boys

Schoolboys in Fort Wayne, Ind., are taught by the city to be useful as well as ornamental, and to acquire some of their education in ways not contemplated by the school authorities. Incidentally they are putting work in their way by which they may earn a little spending money.

No one can hereafter say that the botanical education of these lads is being neglected, for it is in the caring for the city's shade trees and shrubbery that they are employed. For the forestry department of any city to inspect the trees on all of its streets and in its parks, with the regular force of employes, would be tackling a big proposition, and so the boys, those from 12 to 15 years of age, who are scattered in all parts of the city, are used for the work.

They are first trained to recognize the more common varieties of scale and tree and shrub diseases by an expert forester, and are then made deputy city foresters. They are required to make a very thorough inspection of the trees in their respective districts and report their condition and whatever disease symptoms they find to the city officials. When a serious case of scale is reported the city officials notify the property owner in front of whose premises the tree stands.

Then the matter is passed on to an older class of school boys, who have formed a stock company, and with the company funds have bought a spraying kit and are ready to take the diseased tree in charge. It is for them to make arrangements with the owner to give the trees the spraying that is required.

Few of the property owners object to paying a reasonable sum to have their trees properly sprayed, and the boys, both class A and class B, have all the work that they can attend to in their spare time. The park work and the taller trees are handled by gangs of regularly employed men, but the boys are given all shrubs and bushes and all trees under twenty feet high.

In this way, working after school hours and on Saturday, the boys are able to earn from $5 to $20 a week, and as a result they are kept out of mischief, they are in business for themselves, they are getting a practical education in forestry, and the trees of the city are kept in a thrifty and healthy condition, adding greatly to the appearance of the streets. Boys will be boys, that is very true, but the world could hardly get along without them.—Batavia News.

Planting Trees to Die

It is a curious fact that when the country schools of the State celebrate Arbor day, May 7, the pupils of most schools would have to go off their school grounds in order to place their hands on a tree. Most district schools do not have a respectable tree. Sometimes they have caricature trees, young, stripling things which are struggling in an unequal battle for life.

The district school plants a tree in the front yard every year. It plants the tree in the front yard because there is no other place to plant it. Then the tree dies the next year or the year after. It doesn't die because it wasn't planted right, for a tree is really a tough thing to kill. It dies because it wasn't left alone and it wasn't left alone because the average school ground is about the size of a city building lot.

School grounds in the country are always placed in a hill, or a side hill, if there is any around, because that is the least valuable ground to be had and the school district can buy it at the rate of $30 an acre, instead of $50. In any event, the school ground is kept as small as possible, instead of made as large as possible. This is true whether in the rich farming districts of the Adirondacks and the Catskills. In the rich, farming country an acre of ground is too valuable to be given to such necessary evils as children and in the poor waste regions an acre at $5 costs too much. So the district spends $15 to build a fence around its building lot of a school ground.

So the pupils play in the road and on the farmer's lot and brush against their Arbor day tree when the school bell rings.

It is often better to be a cow in a well ventilated, perpetually watered cement cow barn than to be a school boy in the same school district where the cow lives.—Utica Press.

ROUND ABOUT

Whether an attempt to steal the contents of six bags of mail constitutes one offence or six is a question which the Supreme Court of the United States will be called upon to decide. Thomas W. Gregory, Attorney General, filed in the court a brief for T. W. Morgan, warden at the United States Penitentiary at Leavenworth, Kan., in an action brought by George Ebeling, a prisoner there who seeks to escape serving six sentences imposed, one of three years' imprisonment for each bag.

Hereafter peace officers and constables in towns of New York State will be authorized to forbid the sale of intoxicants to a person addicted to their use by serving notice in writing upon dealers.

Governor Whitman has signed the Jones bill, giving town officials this authority. It is the first prohibition measure that has become a law this session.

Miss Mary Garrett, only daughter of the late John W. Garrett, president of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, who died suddenly Friday night at her home the Deanery, on Bryn Mawr College campus, Baltimore, was one of the best known women philanthropists in this country. In association with her intimate friend, Miss M. Carey Thomas of Baltimore, now president of Bryn Mawr College, she established in 1885 the Bryn Mawr School for Girls, and had since that time liberally maintained it, making up all deficits whenever needed and building for it in 1890 its present beautiful school house, costing over $300,000. Also, in 1890, Miss Garrett made it possible for the Medical School of the Johns Hopkins University to open, and secured the admission of women. In 1908 she rebuilt, at a cost of over $100,000, the Deanery, the president's house, at Bryn Mawr. In 1906 she was elected a director of the college, and from that time served as an active member of the Committee on Buildings and Grounds and the Finance Committee. In 1907, after Susan B. Anthony's death, Miss Garrett and Miss Thomas raised a fund of $12,000 for five years to carry on Miss Anthony's work. From that time until now she has given largely for the national woman's suffrage work.

Editor Times: You have asked a hard thing of aged people who are unaccustomed to writing for publication. If you think this letter will be of interest to anyone, it will serve the purpose for which it was written.

Respectfully yours, C. L. HIGHRITER

Let me say I first opened my eyes to the beautiful things of this world in the year of 1826, just across the lower bridge, at the junction of Hannibal and Worth sts. I have lived but one mile from my birthplace all my life. My present home I have occupied fifty-three years, have lived to see Fulton, but little more than a hamlet, changed to the present wide-awake, active business crowds.

I remember seeing some of the first canal boats passing through the village as early as 1831.

My father helped to build the M. E. church which has been my have heard him say he taught seventeen winter terms and most of the summer terms in the schoolhouse on the present site of Langdon house. He taught the first school in Granby and Volney.

I remember when the first Presbyterian church stood midway between 1st and 2d sts. in Oneida. The Rev. Mr. Eastman occupied the pulpit in 1836. The church was moved to the corner of 2d st. and converted into a dwelling house which was destroyed by the big fire of 1851.

My father helpto build the M. E. church which has been my home since fifteen years of age. I can recall so many of the dear, earnest ministers who watched for our spiritual welfare. I recall Stone, Vandercook, Dunning, Haughton, Bowdish, Leet, Hewitt, Gillet,, Reedhead, Cooper, Danforth and Dibble, the two last within recent years. Nearly all have gone to their rest and reward—only two of them are still living.

At that early day an M. E. pastor could not remain on the same charge more than two years.

How well I remember the first one who occupied a place in Mt. Adnah—Russel Case, a man of sterling worth, esteemed and respected by all—walk through its avenues today and count its many sleepers and mark the change.

I well remember the donor of the ground where Falley Seminary now is and recall when it was being built. The Rev. E. E. E. Bragdon was principal in 1848. I recall the time when every room from basement to attic was occupied with students, even the bellfry. A young man called the students to morning prayers.

Before the seminary came into being there was a school opened called "Fulton Female Seminary," opened for young ladies, myself one of its pulpits. It stood where the Catholic barn now stands afterwards merged into Falley Seminary.

The first cemetery in Fulton was in Utica st. many of the bodies never were removed.

I remember when the Indians came each year to hunt and trap on Neahtawanta, then called Little lake. One of the big chiefs often came to my father's house.

Where the factory, with its teeming industry now stands, there was only two one-story dwellings—minus paint and not a house from 1st st. to the lake. I can hardly believe myself as I ride over the grounds and mark so great a change, but I see "the world does move."

I recall an incident that occurred at the Seminary when Prof. Griffin was the leading spirit of that institution. Some mischievious students managed in some way to get a pig to the third or fourth floor without the Professor's knowledge. When he found it there he was so enraged he threw the poor pig out the window and it had to be put out of its misery. The incident called forth much comment from kind-hearted people, but he never found who the culprit was.

I remember some of Prof. Griffin's retinue of teachers—Prof. Brower, Prof. Eglaston, Prof. Slee and Prof. Underwood; also, the Misses R. Coit and Schenck. Many names I cannot recall.

I recall when the park was covered with oak bushes. It was then called Public Square. It not being exactly square Quartus Rust always spoke of it as the Public Long.

In writing of the first cemetery I should have said it occupied the ground from Cayugo, Utica and Rochester sts. from 3d to 4th. Many graves were disturbed on the building which occupy the land at present. Where the Presbyterian parsonage stands the lot had grown to brambles and weeds, when we moved to our present home, 53 years ago.

These days carry me back to the days of my usefulness, long since passed. I am only waiting the summons, "The Master has come and calleth for thee."

SOLD POWDER THAT DIDN'T KILL

Insects Were Not Killed by Preparations So Government Collected Fines

Buffalo, April 8—Because they purported to manufacture powder to kill vermin, whereas it was proven that the same vermin continued to wax healthy, able-bodied and destructive, under even the most stringent applications, the Rochester Germicide Co. of Rochester and J. W. Hall of Pembrook, N.Y., were fined by United States Judges Edwin F. Thomas in district court this morning.

The Rochester Germicide Company are the makers of a powder which they claim puts the long quietus on all manner of vermin. They claim also, that it is free from corrosive and poisonous properties. The United States, through Assistant District Attorney Donald Bain, repudiates the claims of the company and alleges that it is neither a germicide nor is it free from corrosive properties. The company was adjudged guilty of misbranding, and was fined $20. The interstate shipments under which the company was prosecuted were from Rochester to Boston.

J. W. Hall of Pembrook, N. Y., thought he had an insect powder that was sure death to poultry vermin and others of the same ilk. Since it was not sure death, as the government proved, he was found guilty of misbranding and was fined $5. The shipment took place from Pembrook to Erie, Pa.

Another company found guilty of misbranding was the firm of Frank Chesbro & Bros. of Salamanca, N.Y. They were accused of shipping cattle feed called "Purative Milk-Maker," from Salamanca to Veazie, Me. They were adjudged guilty of misbranding on account of the fact that the amount of protein and fat did not equal the claims made for it on the label. The firm was fined $15.

LYNCH TO REMAIN IN LABOR DEPARTMENT

James M. Lynch, state labor commissioner and former president of the International Typographical Union, will be retained in the state service regardless of how state departments are re-organized, Governor Whitman has said.

If the bill intended to combine the labor department and the workmen's compensation commission is enacted, Lynch will be given a position in connection with the administration of the labor laws as important as the one he now holds, according to the governor.

Active Chamber of Commerce.

The secretary of the Tiffin (O.) chamber of commerce calls on at least five members of the chamber daily, asking them for the following: First, attention to payment of dues; second, suggestions as to how the chamber can be of benefit to their business and to the community generally; third, names of additional prospective members. This gives every member the sense of personal attention, and gives him an opportunity to express himself freely, providing a constructive program of work for the chamber.

STYLE TIPS FROM NEW YORK

New Blouses, Laced Closings, Nets, Fringes and Pleatings

McCall Design

New York, April 8.—The average well-dressed woman here wears a wash blouse with her Spring suit, and it is apt to be of crepe either silk or cotton made on smart tailored lines, and decidedly loose as to fit, whether the wearer is young and slender, or otherwise. Cotton voile, and batiste makes many attractive waists, and the latter show many ruffles down the front and at the wrist, but embroidery and lace are sparingly employed in the best models. Striped effects with the stripes widely spaced and decided in coloring, are reckoned excellent style. The set-in sleeve has quite superseded the kimono, and the shoulder line setting is the popular mode, though in a few smartly tailored blouses in linen and pongee silks the raglan sleeve that extends to the neck is employed. Collars of red and blue linen are used on white waists—a French idea for reproducing the red, white and blue, of their flag—and ours also.

Laced Closings

As the season progresses the liking for lacings is increasingly manifest. Bodices lace in front, peasant fashion, and skirts lace at the back or at some point that emphasizes the line. Rather large cords are the rule for these lacings, and many are covered with silk to match or contrast with the dress. Spikes of various sorts usually finish the ends.

Considerable use is made of narrow fringes and ball trimmings of jet and galoon. These are used to edge the scallops, turrets, and points that are a very notable fad for skirt trimmings, especially at the foot line. Narrow knife plaitings of taffeta silk are similarly employed for all of fussy frocks, where an irregular foot edge is desired. Cordings of taffeta or of the dress material are perhaps the most popular device for very full circular skirts that finish evenly all round. Nets of all sorts are in such great demand for blouses and dress combinations that a shortage of this material is predicted.

Fancy Parasols

The freakish and fancy styles that prevail in fashionable costume demand corresponding accessories, and there are no end of fancy styles in parasols that go admirably with such picturesque lines. Flat-topped Japanese parasols, known as "Chin Chins", with long tips of ivory, shell or black bone caught under a matching ring when the parasol is closed, Pagoda-like tops shirred and corded in many ways, star-shaped parasols shirred on heavy contrasting cords at the center of each rib with bindings of the contrasting color. Stripes are very smartly employed and run in all directions, but usually across on the flat shapes, and lengthwise on the shirred styles. Combinations of plain and striped or flowered silks are in endless variety, and result in very striking designs. The average parasol of the season is nothing if not pronounced in design and coloring. Even the black and whites are staringly prominent.

Buttons are extremely popular as a trimming factor, and one of the most used styles is a four-eyed black bone button with a matching rim. These are used on woolen dresses and suits, especially on serges and covert and gabardines, but silk and silk poplins are also trimmed with this decidedly utilitarian style of button now that it is faddish. Pearl buttons of the same type are very much used with linen and heavy cotton materials.

HIS MIND OBSCURED

Therefore He Preferred to Not Plead Guilty.

William Chappel, an old offender, was arraigned in Police Court this morning on a charge of drunkeness. Chappel was arrested last night at his home last night on complaint of his wife who telephoned that he was creating a disturbance. Officer Fox brought Chappel to jail.

This morning at the hearing it was learned that Chappel has not done a day's work all winter, but nevertheless finds money enough to keep continually intoxicated. His wife did not appear against him but she had stated in advance that she has had to support him and has been compelled to keep up the home by the fruits of her labor.

When asked for a statement, Chappel was properly penitent. He said he didn't want to plead guilty to drunkeness as he didn't think he was drunk. When questioned about the circumstances of his arrest, however, he failed to remember anything. He took up about an hour of the court's time in cogitating on his plea, and he was finally remanded to jail to think it over.

Three men from Oswego arrested for drunkeness and disorderly conduct were also arraigned before Judge Wilson. They were fined $5 with the alternative of five days in the Oswego jail. They were committed.

BABY CITY FOUR

The Baby City Four of this city will make its professional debut Sunday afternoon in Syracuse when the quartet will appear at a memorial service given by the Loyal Order of Moose. The Fultonians will sing "Nearer My God, to Thee," and "Rock of Ages" during the sevice, and they will render some popular hits at a reception afterward.

James Keeler, Chester Kempston, Cadwallader Appelton and Leonard Roy will do the honors for the quartet. John Perchway is business manager of the team, and E. J. LaPorte the accompanist.

VACATIONISTS RETURN

The Oswego Normal students will return to school Tuesday.

NEW GASOLINE PUMP

The VanWagenen corporation is installing a new gasoline pump at its garage in 1st st. The pump will give a supply at all times through a hose which can be carried to the waiting car. The tank, which is placed under the sidewalk, will hold 550 gallons.

At present there is a tank and pump inside the garage, but this was found inconvenient and inadequate to meet the demands of the summer auto traffic.

High School Faculty to Enforce This Year the Scholarship Rule

The warm weather yesterday brought many old bats, balls and gloves out of retirement and in the outlying districts many baseball stars in embryo could be seen taking the first kinks out of the old "super."

It won't be many moons before the sandlot stars will be busy and the majority of the youngsters are counting the days.

* * *

The Fulton High school team will start active work this week, and Coach Len Roy issued an order for practise today. The boys will hold their first drill on the grounds in the rear of the Seminary and from the present outlook there will be a record turnout of candidates.

* * *

Keeler, last year's star batter and base runner, who will hold down the third sack again this season is developing speed over the polished floor of a local confectionery parlor and says he is right down to training weight now.

* * *

O'Brien, last year's second pitcher, who will probably have to bear the brunt of the hurling work this year, says his arm is in great shape. He has mastered all the curves and speed of the modern dances and, in the opinion of Coach Roy, he should make this a banner year.

* * *

Roy will make some stringent training rules this year for the players and they will be rules that any man who really has the interest of his school at heart will be glad to keep. In former years people have cherished the delusion that a high school ball player could do anything and still play good ball. In the last three or four years many high schools no larger than Fulton have engaged a good coach and he has issued his orders [illegible] ed them in the same manner that a college coach or big league manager would.

* * *

This system has proven itself a success in more ways than one. There never was a ball player who couldn't bed ispensed with at any time, no matter how much of a star he might be. Rules are made to be obeyed and if Roy carries out the idea it will for the good of the team and the school and the players on the squad will show the proper spirit by living up to the rules to the letter.

* * *

Excessive cigarette smoking will come under the ban and late hours, and improper food will also be put on the blacklist.

* * *

The faculty intend to strictly enforce the scholarship rule this year, and it behooves every candidate for the team to make it his business to keep up in his studies at all times.

S. E. Chandler an Old Resident Comments on Home Paper.

S. E. Chandler, a former resident of this city and now of Minneapolis, Minn., writes his friend, H. N. Gilbert, his opinion regarding the "new daily," He says:

"I received the copy of The Evening Times you so kindly sent. Think it a good up-to-date daily, i. e., for a new paper in a small place. When I say "small place," I mean a town that wil support three weekly papers and may not be willing to support one daily. Those who ought to support it are apt to say, "I take an out of town paper which gives me the news." Now it requires the assistance of the people as well as the editor to make it a success."

Mr. Chandler stated further he is active in business, and that he would like to return to this section for a visit to the "old stamping ground."

WHO'LL BE THE NEXT MAYOR?

Political Pot Shows Signs of Boiling; Three Men of Each Party In Prospect

Although the day of election is still far distant, discussion in business centers, clubs and meeting places in town are already featured by a lot of political talk. Since the recent Chamber of Commerce campaign, it has been proven conclusively that some big changes in local politics are bound to take place next fall. Men who are interested are already bending their energies toward separating the chaff from the wheat, and it is pretty certain that the political lineup for next election will be decided long before election day.

In every quarter there seems to be a great deal of dissatisfaction expressed with the way things have been running in the city for the past few years. A prominent business man stated this morning that the Republican and Democratic parties were both the objects of censure because of proceedings during that time. One or two city appointments have been especially the objects of criticism, and it is hinted that the appointees would be in office just the same had the Democratic party carried the last election. It is apparent that the party leaders decide on appointments before election and the matter of voting is a mere formality.

Many there are, h wever, who do not propose to stand idly by this year until the eleventh hour and then bend their energies toward placing an efficient administration in office. They mean to get at work early this year, and sentiment favors an independent municipal ticket in the strongest way.

An independent ticket—something easy to conjure, but not easy to select. By an independent ticket—one worthy of [redacted] conditions of Fulton could be bettered 100 per cent., according to the men who advocate the idea. But the ticket this year will be selected with care by men who may have been hoaxed once, perhaps more than once, but who are determined to forego the experience again.

Several men are mentioned for the mayoralty. To meet the favor of the great majority the next candidate for Mayor must be absolutely independent of any ties which bind to a recognized organization; in addition to being a conservative and practical business man, he must not be a man who is identified in the slightest way with any large manufacturing concern in the city. Above all things he must be a man who has the interests of Fulton at heart, and who can work hard in conjunction with the Chamber of Commerce for the betterment of the city.

Three Democrats and three Republicans, who, to all appearances, meet every requirement which will be demanded by the people at large; have been mentioned. They are Frederick G. Spencer, J. A. Morrill, L. P. Smith, J. C. O'Brien, Maurice Conley and George B. Palmer. All of these men are Fultonians of reputation, men who are interested in the development of the city, and men who having once given their word will keep it. It is stated that none of these men are after the nomination, some of them would absolutely refuse it, but all of them are highly desirable.

A conservative business administration is what is needed now in the city, just as much as new industries, and until radical changes are made in the political personel of the city at present, Fulton's advancement will be hampered.

Al of those mentioned for the office are men who will stick closely to pre-election promises and, having once decided upon a course calculated to advance the city in every way, will not deviate from that course for any personal or other obligations or considerations.

One fact is certain, the ticket must be independent in every way and in every office. Such a ticket is certain to meet the approval of every intelligent citizen who has no motive other than the benefit of the city at heart.

FORM PARTNERSHIP

Local Men Become Partners in Printing Concern.

C. T. Bailey, for eight years the owner of a job printing office on 2d st., and W. A. Merton, for many years with the Morrill Press, have formed a partnership under the name of the Commercial Press. The firm will operate a modern job printing and publishing plant at 9 N. 2d st. Both men are experts at their line of work and with their modern facilities, they expect to make the new plant one of the foremost of Fulton.

A gang of men, headed by an expert from the Babcock factory, is installing a rotary Babcock press at the plant. It is expected that the press will be in position Saturday and the public is cordially invited to see it in action any time next week. It is the onlyp ress of its kind in the city and is designed to do the finest kind of catalog and book work at high speed.

A large paper cutter has [redacted]ed in the plant and the equipment including the other presses, is of a high order. The company is at present negotiating for a large catalog contract with a western mail order house, and if the contract is landed additional equipment will be installed and the working force will be increased.

LYNCH REPORTS BUREAU WORK

Labor Department Sent 25 Per Cent of Applicants Out to Positions

Albany, April 8.—Up to the beginning of the present month there have been 16,644 applicants for work registered with the Labor Departments Employment Bureau, out of which a total of 4,310, over 25 per cent, have been sent out to positions. These figures are contained in a statement issued today by State Labor Commissioner James M. Lynch relative to the work of the newest Bureau in the Department.

Of the number applying for places since the Bureau has been running 13,480 were males, and of the number who were sent out to work 2,546 were men and 1,764 were women. Of those who applied for places 10,287 were native born, 8,111 men and 2,176 women; and 6,357 were foreign born, 5,369 men and 988 women. Of the foreign born applicants 2,545 were naturalized. Of the total who registered 7,109 were married.

The majority of those registering wantes places in the metals and machinery trades, while building and construction came next, followed by domestic and personal service, and clerical and professional in the order named.

Since the Employment Bureau ofbeen calls for 3,488 workers from 2,389 employers. These calls were for both men and women, 1,965 of the former and 1,523 of the latter. The greatest demand from employers was for domestic and personal service, the total being 832. There were 402 calls for help in the metals and machinery group, 390 calls for farm help and requests were made for 345 workers in the building and construction industry.

Branch offices of the Bureau are now in operation in Brooklyn, Buffalo, Rochester and Syracuse and a [redacted]ch will be opened in Albany during the present month.

The month of March has shown an increase in the work in each branch. The total registsation in all offices for last month was 6,284 of which 1,344 were women. There were in that month 2,812 foreign born applicants who registered with the Bureau, 433 of them being women. During the same period of time, Commissioner Lynch reports that 1,566 men and 1,024 women, in all 2,590, were referred to positions. Employers numbering 1,291 asked the Bureau for 1,903 okers in March, the greatest demand being for domestic service, for which there were 432 calls. Next came the building and construction, in which the Bureau received 256 calls, while agricultrre came next with a demand for 252 farm hands.

In the Brooklyn office there were 2,307 registrations in March as against 2,239 in February while the calls for help in March were 750 as against 521. Theg reatest demand was for workers in the building line, 171 all told, while next came clothing, millinery and furnishings with 118 cals ann domestic service third with 111 cals. The tatol number referred to positions in March by the Brooklyn office was 1,247 of which 813 men.

There has been considerable demand made on the Brooklyn office during March for women machine operators in the garment trades, and Commissioner Lynch reports that the office was not able to fill this demand up to the first of the present month.

In Buffalo office the total registrations during March were 1,324 of which 319 were women, while there weere 176 emplofers who asked the Bureau to furnish 249 workers, 17b men and 75 women. The greatest demand here was for domestic service, agriculture coming next and building and construction third. The office reports that it referred 2[redacted] men and 110 women to places.

In the Rochester office the registration for the past month was 1,208, —964 men and 244 women, while there were 428 employers who asked the Bureau to provide 492 workers, 251 men and 241 women. The Bureau's report shows that it referred 258 men and 277 women to positions. The Rochester office devotes Saturdays to the farmers and in handling farm help it has easily led all of the other offices.

The Syracuse office during March had a total registration of [redacted]45 of which [redacted] were men, them a[redacted]y of those registering asking for [redacted] on farms. The office had calls for help from 338 employers who wanted 412 workers, and there were 464 persons, 261 men and 203 women, who were referred to positions by the Bureau.

While agriculture was the third industry represented in the total calls for help, 80 per cent of these calls for farm hands came from the Rochester and Syrahuse offices. There has been little call for farm hands in the Brooklyn and Buffalo offices and Commissioner Lynch reports that up to the present there has been little necessity of sending farm hands from New York City, the local markets being abe to supply the calls that have been received. Besides the demand on the Brooklyn office for women machine operators in the garment trades, there has also been a large demand from the merchant tailoring industry for all sorts of workers and this tade has commenced to demand that the vocational schools take up the teaching of tailoring.

ALBANY LETTER DAY BY DAY

By Frederic T. Cardoze

Albany, April 8.—William H. Anderson, of New York city, State superintendent of the Anti-saloon League, predicts that there is to be trouble for some men high up in the councils of the Republican party due to the action of the Legislature in dealing with the Optional Local Option bill. In a statement sent out by Superintendent Anderson, it is quite freely set forth that the situation in Albany with regard to the bill in question, has brought anything but pleasure to those who are behind the measure.

"After three months of legislative juggling," writes Superintendent Anderson, "Speaker Sweet will next week find himself just where he was with reference to this bill when the session opened, that is, facing the responsibility for securing an open vote on the merits of the bill on the floor of the Assembly."

Superintendent Anderson continues by declaring that there has been pulling and hauling on the rules committee of the Assembly, to which committee the bill he so ardently favors is shortly to be referred. "Pressure has been brought to bear upon members of this committee," he says, "to get the bill out on the floor before it was too late. In fact, it looked at one time as though it might be done."

While Speaker Sweet is an influential member of the Assembly, it is doubted in some quarters if individually he could have been entirely to blame for the recommittal of the big excise bills to committee after they had once been reported; Superintendent Anderson, however, appears to think that both he and Assemblyman Malone, chairman of the Assembly committee on excise did their utmost to have the bills sent back to the Assembly committee on excise.

Assemblyman Hamilton Fish, Jr., of Putnam county, has been one of the champions of excise measures this year. He introduced the State-Wide Prohibition bill, but that measure shared the fate of the other bills bearing on prohibition; it as recommitted after it had been reported.

While some of the legislators apparently do not approve of the metho Superintendent Anderson has of fighting for his bills, there are none who will not agree that he has been an ardent champion of the bills which have been introduced with the intent of striking a blow at the liquor drinking habit.

In his most recent statement, Superintendent Anderson says that one of the assemblymen who was friendly to the legislation he favored, left for the west recently. The departure of the assemblyman in question, further reduced the chances of favorable action of the excise committee with relation to the big excise bills, Superintendent Anderson believes.

It is quite plain from the statement just sent out by Superintendent Anderson, that he is determined to keep up his fight for the excise legislation he favors, right up to the end of the session. "We shall see what we shall see," are the words with which he concludes his remarks.

That there was a nicely laid plan to beat the excise bills, is the charge of Superintendent Anderson. He says that those who favored the bills did not want Assemblyman Malone named as chairman of the excise committee of the lower house, but that notwithstanding, he was designated as the presiding officer of that committee.

About Sports Generally

By Frank G. Menke

Twenty-five thousand dollars in real, regular money was offered for the twin brother of the penny that won a pennant and world series for George Stallings, chief of those crackless Boston Braves. The offer was rejected.

Capt. Tillinghast Huston, part owner of the thoroughly renovated and probably rejuvenated Yankees, made the offer. Capt. Cushman Rice, the foremost American in Cuba, and the owner of the penny, spurned it.

And now Captain Rice fears that Captain Huston, who lives in Havana, when he isn't living elsewhere, will hang him on the knob some dark night and try to take the penny away from him, or hire some one to burglarize his rooms.

"But I don't care what happens, Captain Huston can't have that penny," says Captain Rice. "I might need that penny myself some day."

Captain Huston wants the penny so that he can pass it along to "Wild Bill" Donovan, who is serving time just now as the manager of the Yankees. "Wild Bill" wants the penny because he feels that if he bets the penny he can win a pennant and a world series just as did George Stallings.

Captain Rice gave the penny to Stallings early last summer. At that time the Braves were hopelessly in the rut.

"Take this, George, and keep it with you. It'll bring you luck," said Captain Rice, during the presentation ceremonies.

Stalling stook the penny—and everybody knows what happened afterward. On the same day that Stallings got that penny the Braves won a game. The next day they won another. And they continued to win until there wasn't any more use of winning. They had won everything in sight.

Stallings will tell you that it was the penny that whirled the Braves from the cellar position to the crest of baseball. Some persons think it was because the Braves played better baseball than anyone else. But that's an erroneous idea. The penny did it—the very same penny that Captain Rice gave to Stallings.

Stallings never permitted the penny to leave his possession. Many men have wanted to examine it, but they have made their examination with Stallings holding the penny in his own hand. One day, while Stallings was showing the penny to an anxious inquirer, one of the players touched it—"just for luck." The next time that player stepped to the plate there were three men on bases. He tripled—and the Braves won. Ever afterward, when the Braves needed a hit in a pinch, Stallings ordered his men to touch the penny. When they id they usually delivered.

Captain Rice, who served in the American army in both Cuba and the Philippines, found the two pennies around the neck of a Cuban negro who was killed in one of the recent racial wars in Cuba. The pennies were in a little bag. In company with the pennies were some herbs [illegible] charms and other trinkets.

"That fellow was one of those hoodoo doctors," said Captain Rice. "That bag full of trinkets is used by those fellows to chase away evil spirits and bring good luck. I am not superstitious, but Stallings is. So I gave him that penny to see how it would work. It seem sto have worked fine.

"This other penny ought to work better. The one I gave to Stallings was in perfect condition. The one I am keeping is bent. That's where the bullet hit before it pierced the throat of the negro.

"Captain Huston is an old pal of mine, and I'd do almost anything for him. But giving him that penny or even selling it to him is a bit beyond that. Since Stallings did so much with the penny he has I've begun to think that the penny I've got might help me in times of need. So I'm keeping it for a rainy day."

THE DETACHABLE LINING.

This Is For Wear Under Handsome Blouses of Silk or Crepe.

The careful woman will find it advisable to instruct her seamstress to make a detachable lining of fine net or habutai silk for wear beneath the blouse of georgette crepe of radium or of some one of the new striped silks. Such a foundation should have sleeves rather loosely shaped and terminating just above the elbow. In warm weather the perspiration across the back and on the arms is apt to stain or fade the fine material of the outer garment.

The lining should be made separately and then loosely tacked to the inside of the blouse about the neck and shoulders. It will then be easily removed for a visit to the laundry or for other renovation. Two linings for a fine waist are better than one, because this insures a greater preservation of the outer fabric through cleanliness of the inner, and while one lining is being laundered the other may be readily adjusted to the blouse. This same idea applies to the frock of silk or of linen. Of course it is not advisable where the outer fabric is of sheer material like organdie, thin voile or kindred materials.

Allowance should be made for shrinkage when making up a new blouse or dress. A couple of extra blouse inches should be extended beneath the belt, and at the top of the skirt the material may be turned back so that after it comes from its first tubbing it may be let down without serious inconvenience.

Filling For Pincushions.

Coffee grounds rinsed in cold water and spread out to dry thoroughly on a sheet of paper make filling for a cushion which is warranted not to rust needles or pins thrust into it.

FADS AND FANCIES.

Shirring marks many frocks of soft fabrics. The skirts are shirred on cords about the hips, thus disposing of fullness that might otherwise be awkward in a skirt not cut on circular lines.

The fad has many advocating this spring. There are some pretty frocks of taffeta, with hemstitched fichus of the sheerest muslin. Many lingerie frocks have ruffled fichus draped about the shoulders. And even some evening frocks show this quaint adjunct.

If one may judge by the shops, women are again going to buy separate leather belts, for many and good ones are shown. They are to wear with one piece frocks and with coats of linen and of wool.

There is some difficulty about getting imported laces owing to the war, but there is no difficulty in getting lacy and sheer fabrics. There is lace cloth, for instance, a fabric with all the sheerness and irregularity of surface of all over lace, yet with a good deal of body and strength.

All Play Runs Broken

Poor Jones got in a trance
And ceased from being sporty;
He woke, by some mischance,
In nineteen hundred-forty.
Oh, how the world was changed
In virtue and in flaw!
He thought himself deranged
Until this sign he saw:
"Again today that serial play,
The Case of Harry Thaw!"

Said Jones, "Am I advanced
Too greatly in my data,
And was I but entranced
One day from twelve to eight?"
"Oh, no," they said, "you've slept
Years twenty-five away,
And still we've daily kept
Exhibiting our play:
This show appeals in fifty reels—
'The Case of Thaw' today!"

"Pahaw!" said the Rip-like one;
"You're fooling me, I know.
D'ye mean this show has run
Since nineteen-six or so?"
They answered: "Yes, indeed;
We put it on each year,
And people come with speed
Whene'er our signs appear:
We have the film that's sure to thrill'm—
'The Case of Thaw' is here!"

You talk of "Uncle Tom,"
"Old Homestead" and "East Lynne!"
We take the laurels from
Those dramas old and thin.
"Camille" will be forgot
And no one think of Shaw
When still there is a spot
Wherein this sign will draw:
"Come in and see our comedy—
The Case of Harry Thaw!"

COLOR AND MOISTURE.

There Is a Good Reason Why Vegetation Is Mostly Green.

Doubtless many have wondered why the vegetation of the earth is mostly green. That is, not what makes it green, but why it is that color instead of blue or red or purple.

Moisture, it has been found, will be collected by the green foliage in proper quantities while foliage of other colors will not be properly nourished by the dews and moisture from earth and atmosphere.

A rather curious experiment proves this.

Paint a piece of glass yellow, another green and one red and one black and place all these painted pieces of glass out in the open air over night during a summer or autumn night.

When examined early the following morning it will be found that the yellow piece will be very wet and the green piece only fairly moist, while the red and black pieces will be dry.

This is proof that yellow foliage would collect too much dampness, and the red and black would gather none. Green, which collects the medium amount of moisture, seems to be the color best adapted to the conditions existing throughout the earth.

Yellow foliage has been known to damp off and decay under the same conditions that makes green foliage thrive.

A RECORD PRESCRIPTION.

After It Was Bought and Paid For It Lost Its Charm.

The largest amount ever officially recorded as the purchase price of a prescription is £5,000 ($25,000), paid by the British parliament to a Mrs. Stevens to reveal the ingredients of her cure for "gravel and stone in the bladder and kidneys." Parliament voted this amount to satisfy the demands of the British public; also because Mrs. Stevens would not take a penny less for her secret.

The ingredients as revealed by Mrs. Stevens were as follows: "Eggshells, snails (shells and all), hips and haws, ash keys, swine cress and various other vegetables all burned to a cinder, and the ash mixed with camomile flowers and fennel and other vegetables."

Curiously enough, when this high priced prescription was made public it immediately lost its potency—and its popularity. New cases failed to respond to its magic, and cases which had been cured while its mysteries were still unrevealed promptly developed new symptoms. At the end of a year it was practically forgotten. But its price record still stands; also the record of one instance in which a British parliament failed to get its money's worth.—Los Angeles Times.

Snuff Spoons.

All the world is familiar with snuff boxes, but snuff spoons are pretty little refinements of which this generation has hardly heard. Very probably they came into use about two years after Sir George Rooke's expedition to Vigo bay in 1702, when he captured half a ton of tobacco and snuff from the Spanish galleons, and snuff thus became a common article in England. One of the characters in a comedy published at Oxford in 1704, entitled "An Act at Oxford," by Thomas Baker, says, "But I carry sweet snuff for the ladies," to which Arabella replies: "A spoon too. That's very gallant, for to see some people run their fat fingers into a box is as nauseous as eating without a fork." In the forties and fifties of the last century snuff spoons were still in use on the Scottish border. They were of bone and of a size to go into the snuffbox. People fed their noses, it was said, as naturally as they carried soup to their mouths.—London Mail.

STANDING TIMBER.

Rule by Which to Figure Out Its Contents in Board Feet.

The contents of trees in board feet is usually figured by Doyle's rule. This rule is to deduct four inches from the small diameter of the log for slab, squaring one quarter of the remainder and multiplying the results by the length of the log in feet. For example, to find the contents of a twelve foot log twenty-four inches in diameter (inside the bark) at the small end—24 inches minus 4 inches equal 20 inches; 20 inches by ¼ equal 5 inches; 5 by 5 by 12 equal 300 board feet.

Perhaps an easier way to get at the same result is to state the rule as follows: From a sixteen foot log deduct four inches for slab and square the remainder. For longer or shorter logs the contents would be proportioned to the length. In the above case it would be worked out thus: 24 minus 4 equals 20, 20 by 20 equals 400, for a sixteen foot log. But a twelve foot log is twelve-sixteenths or three-quarters as long as a sixteen foot log; therefore this log contains three-quarters of 400 board feet, or 300 board feet. If the log were twenty feet long it would contain one and one-quarter times 400 feet, or 500 feet.

A common way of estimating standing timber is to estimate the length and the top and bottom diameters and apply Doyle's rule, using the average of both diameters and the whole length of the tree.—Rural New Yorker.

BED OF THE THAMES.

It Often Yields to Dredgers Relics of the Ancient Romans.

"Yes, sir," said the skipper of a Thames dredger as he wiped his grimy hands on the legs of his trousers, "there are many worse jobs than dredging. It is interesting and exciting work, too, for one never knows what the bucket scoops are going to pick up.

"Do we make any rich 'captures?' Occasionally we do, but of course we bring up more mud than anything else. But, personally, I believe that the bottom of the Thames is a small gold mine in disguise, but one that it is impossible to 'work.' A 'nugget' is brought up now and again, and a 'nugget' may mean a gold watch or coins.

"Some time back a bucket scoop brought to the surface a small sack, and this sack contained a number of watches, mostly minus the cases. Evidently they had been thrown into the river by thieves, who had no use for them.

"Human bones are brought to light at infrequent intervals, and so are old metal implements. Roman coins are fairly plentiful [illegible] and London bridge, and some of the copper ones which have been recovered are as clean as new coins from the mint. Julius Caesar coins and weapons have been found in the upper river and some stone age implements down by Hampton court."—London Answers.

A certain estimable old gentleman is at all times worth listening to, though occasionally his grammar is scarcely perfect. He was dining on one occasion with the local squire, when, much to the disgust of his worthy host, a trifling error on the old gentleman's part was pounced upon and loudly repeated by the son and heir of the house. There was a painful silence, broken at length by the host.

"My son," he remarked quietly to the young fellow, "there are times, I admit, when our old friend's speech is a little peculiar. At such times you might be of mutual assistance to each other."

"In what way, sir?" asked the son.

"Well," was the severe rejoinder, "you might give Mr. X. a lesson or two in grammar, in return for which I have no doubt he would assist you to patch up the holes in your manners."—London Tit-Bits.

The Plantagenets.

A flowering English shrub, the broom plant, is called in French "plantagenesta." From it the kingly family of Plantagenet took its name. It is said to have been first used as a badge by them because the Count of Anjou had himself scourged with its branches. The name was taken by Henry II., king of England, in 1154, he being the son of Geoffrey of Anjou, who wore in his helm a spray of the broom when he started for the Holy Land. The best known of the Plantagenets was Richard I., king of England, called "the Lion-Heart."

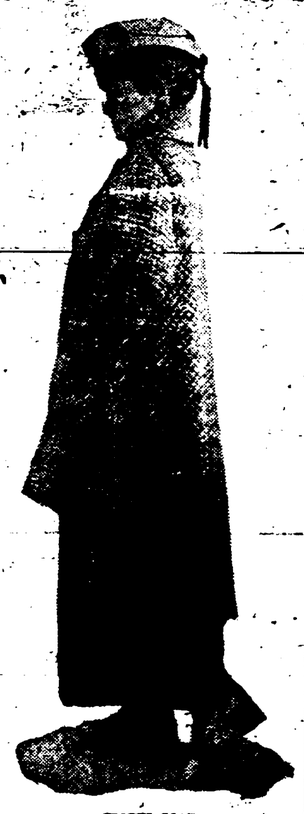
CANADA'S COAL DEPOSITS HAVE BEEN OVERLOOKED

By Victor Elliott.

Experiments conducted by the Canadian Government and the United States geological survey are opening the way for the development of the vast coal deposits in the Canadian middle west. This supply until recently has been overlooked, according to reports to the State Department from Consul Samuel C. Reat at Calgary, Alberta.

The coal deposits of Saskatchewan, especially, have been neglected, says the consul, because they occur in a territory lacking almost entirely resources of timber and water power. Facts brought out by governmental investigations, he adds, placed these deposits on "a much higher plan and paved the way toward obtaining more definite data which will develop uses for these low-grade lignities for purposes hitherto thought impossible."

The more important districts, or, rather, those districts which have been studied in any detail, are very few, but there is no doubt as the demand for coal grows, that other districts will be developed, the consul says:



Estevan district is the only important one at present from the shipping standpoint. It has been only lately that the Willo Bunch area has been tapped by a railway. The coal resources of this region are enormous, according to estimates made by the geological survey of Canada. For instance, the estimated tonnage of the Belly River formation alone is 33,908,000,000 tons. In the Tertiary formation in the Souris area, consisting of eight townships, there are 2,304,000,000 tons; while the areadirectly to the west of Souris has possibilities up to 23,600,000,000 tons.

The Western Dominion Collieries Company controls the principal mines of the Estevan district. This concern is equipped for an output of 1,000 tons a day. The Manitoba and Saskatchewan Coal Company has an output capacity of 2,000 tons a day and the mines of the Eureka Coal & Brick Co. are capable of producing 200 tons every 24 hours. There are some 15 or 18 other mines which supply mostly local markets and are worked only intermittently.

The Dominion Government has just issued a report, the consul advises, showing that 3,821,739 short tons of coal were produced in Alberta in 1914. This output represented a decrease of 11.25 per cent. from that for 1913. The export of coal from Alberta to the United States last year was 106,087 tons, according to the official report. The declared export returns from this consular district, however, show only 7,774 tons, the consul says. There are 246 coal-producing mines in the province of Alberta, of which 62 were new mines opened up last year. The cost of lives in the production of this 3,821,739 tons of coal last year was 209 victims of fatal accidents. Of this number 189 were killed in the Hillcrest mine alone. One man met his death on the surface of this mine. This made the mining accidents for the phole province, aside from those of Hillcrest, only 20, the consul says. The report of Mr. Reat, therefore, would indicate that vast deposits of fuel await only the enterprise and industry of persons with capital to put them on a paying basis of development.

HANGED BY A GHOST.

Curious Story of a Murder and the Discovery of the Crime.

An old volume of the Quarterly Review mentions a crime discovered in a most extraordinary way in Australia in the year 1830, of which a public record is preserved and which figures with full details in the journals of that period.

The confidential steward of a wealthy settler near Sydney stated that his master had suddenly been called to England on important business and that during his absence the whole of his immense property would be in his exclusive care.

Some weeks after an acquaintance of the absentee settler riding through his grounds was astonished to perceive him sitting upon a stile. He strode forward to speak when the figure turned from him with a look of intense sorrow, and walked to the edge of a pond, where it mysteriously disappeared.

On the morrow he brought a number of men to the water to drag it, and the body of the man supposed to be on his way to England was brought up. The steward was arrested, brought to trial and, frightened at the story of his master's ghost, confessed the crime, stating that he did the murder at the very stile on which his master's ghost had appeared. He was duly executed.—Case and Comment.

Dacca, in eastern Bengal, had a special interest for Thackeray since his grandfather, after whom he was named, laid the basis of his fortune as factor there. And in the novelist's day the name, as old people among us will still remember, was synonymous with exquisitely diaphanous textiles, though as a matter of fact the rarest of these "webs of woven wind," "evening dews," "running waters"—such were some of the names given the most delicate of the Dacca muslins—seldom passed beyond the city walls. There is a well authenticated case of the thread being spun into muslin in the proportion of 160 miles to the pound avoirdupois.—London Chronicle.

HEARS BIERCE IS WITH KITCHENER

Daughter of Soldier-Journalist Thought Dead Gets Letter.

DISAPPEARED IN MEXICO.

Long Given Up For Lost—Aiding the Allies, Says Bloomington Report. Now Seventy-three Years Old—Career Reads Like Romance—Brevetted For Bravery in Field.

Major Ambrose Bierce, the author and journalist, who has been sought by his family for over a year, has been found. The mystery of his disappearance was cleared up by the receipt of a letter from him by his daughter, Mrs. Helen Cowden of Bloomington, Ill.

This brought the surprising information that her father was a member of the staff of Lord Kitchener and was aiding in the recruiting service in London. He left Mexico early last fall. Major Bierce wrote that he was in good health.

The state department in Washington has been engaged since last fall in trying to find Major Bierce in Mexico. He was thought to have been murdered there while procuring material for a book on conditions in Mexico.

Bierce's Romantic Career.

Ambrose Bierce was born in Ohio in 1842. He served as a line officer throughout the civil war and received the brevet rank of major for bravery on the field.

As a journalist he wrote of peace and the ways of civilians until a war stirred some corner of the earth and then he took to writing tales of soldiers. One of his most successful books, "Tales of Soldiers and Civilians," dealt with companions in arms he had met during the civil war. The book was popular both in America and Europe, as it depicted the [illegible] countered on the firing line by men who had enlisted.

Major Bierce was living quietly in retirement in Washington when the American army started on the move toward the Mexican border. He heard the call as did many other men of the writing profession who had been in previous wars as correspondents, and he departed for points he thought an American invasion might later reach.

In September, 1914, the state department received a formal request to help in ascertaining the whereabouts of Major Bierce. The request was from a California friend, who transmitted it through Secretary of Interior Lane.

Washington Starts Search.

The state department telegraphed to John R. Silliman, an American consular officer in Mexico, to institute a search for the missing writer. Secretary of War Garrison cabled instructions to General Funston and other American army officers in Mexico to assist in the search.

The last trace of him that the investigators could find located him in Chihuahua City in December, 1913. At that time a battle was impending between the federals and Constitutionalists. A report persisting in Chihuahua City was to the effect that Major Bierce started for his former home in California just before the battle.

When no word was heard of him for eight months literary men took up his case on the supposition that he had in some strange manner lost his life.

Bierce likes to tell this story on himself:

While in San Francisco he visited the new house of an old friend, a gentleman of Irish extraction. The hostess evidently took pride in the house, the furnishings of which were new and beautiful and gave every evidence of taste and refinement. Mr. Bierce, who has an eye for the beautiful, has unstinted praise for everything he saw.

"But," he said, "I am sorry to see this your house, beautiful as it is, lacks one ornament which no Irish home should be without."

"What is that?" she asked, unsuspiciously.

"A pig," replied Mr. Bierce, with a satisfied chuckle.

The hostess' eyes sparkled.

"It did," she said indignantly, "but you have supplied the want."

"Papa Was Very Sad!"

The Revue Bleue prints the diary of a German sergeant major who had charge of the telegraph service in the Verdun district, in which the following telegram sent by the German crown prince to his wife on Sept. 3 was preserved:

After a hard fight we have forced the passage of the Meuse, always finding the enemy fortified in new positions. This means terrible losses, but we advance. Papa, last night at Marville, was very sad. Von Wedel has been killed. Stenay is beautifully situated, but has been severely treated. I am staying at a pretty house belonging to an old lady. Horse Sense.

A remarkable instance of horse sense when a number of riderless steeds, broken loose in the night, ignored a challenge to halt, but stopped on hearing the rattle of rifle bolts, is related in a letter from the front.

"We were on patrol along a dark roadway," says a British trooper, "when we were startled by the thunder of hoofs. The sound of galloping came nearer and nearer down the road until the time came to shout a sharp 'Halt!' The horses were almost upon us when we challenged a second time. No stop. In a second the patrol released safety catches and opened the cut-outs. At the metallic ring of the bolt sections the horses reared back on their haunches. Advancing with our fingers on the triggers, we found the animals were unsaddled and without riders.

"Later we learned they had broken out of their stable. We had no trouble to lead them into a neighboring farmyard, for they knew what the rattle of bolts meant."

A Brave Youth.

The self sacrifice of German youth for the fatherland takes other forms than death on the battlefield. The following letter from a young German in Madrid to a friend in Berlin which appears in the Vossiche Zeitung gives one incident of such patriotism:

"You remember young Leiderer, who was employed by a concern in Madrid. Leiderer waited to serve his fatherland and endeavored to reach Germany by way of Italy with several other young men. They were captured by the French and sent to Corsica. Five of them, including Leiderer, tried to escape, but all were caught. They were tried before a court martial, which rendered a verdict that the originator of the plan be shot. But not one betrayed the other.

"So lots were drawn, and the lot fell to Leiderer. The brave young man faced death without saying a word. He died for his fatherland without having been in the war."

The Mined Trench.

Lieutenant Herbert C. Archer of the Sixteenth lancers, who is at London on furlough, explains the heavy losses in that regiment by telling of the mortality in one mined trench. Lieutenant Patrick of the same regiment, who had not much experience in trench fighting, obtained the consent of the commanding officer to make an attack on a German trench on Feb. 20. Lieutenant Archer continued:

"The trench which the lancers were ordered to occupy appears to have been mined by the enemy, but the artful Germans allowed us to occupy it for twenty-four hours, thus getting as many of our men as possible into it. At daybreak on Feb. 21 there was a terrific explosion, which killed five of our officers outright, and another has since died, and five more were wounded. A large number of the rank and file were killed and wounded. Lieutenant Patrick was probably fatally wounded.

"The trench was completely blown in, and immediately after the explosion the Germans charged. Our reserves were called up, and, assisted by those of the poor fellows in the trench who remained alive, we drove the enemy back with considerable loss. We had to re-entrench and were fighting for forty-eight hours."

Superoptimism.

Dutch Red Cross at Maestricht. Dr. Brocx describes his feelings when seeing all those young men so dreadfully mutilated; then he continues:

"But, much as this spectacle hurt us inwardly, we could not let our feelings show in our faces, for their state of mind was quite contrary to our own. If their bodies were mutilated and their bodily strength diminished their spirit was strong and their appearance lively. Gladness rang in their voices when they thanked us for the refreshments offered them by the Dutch Red Cross. They smoked their pipes and sang 'Tipperary' as if they were setting out ablebodied instead of coming home thus. In a blind man's violin playing there was feeling, but not sorrow. A man who lost both arms ate his biscuit and smoked his pipe as if he had always done it this way."

The writer thus sums up his astonishment:

"These were men who had lived in a war hell for a couple of months, who had spent months in mortal illness surrounded by their country's foe, nursed by people who hated their race and did not understand their language. Wishes or sorrows, and these men returned as wrecks, and did it all as I met them, gladly, gayly and without hatred. This is what puzzles me. Is it a special racial trait of the English people? I do not know, but I do know it is a fact."

Austrian Captive Escapes.

The Prager Tageblatt prints a letter from Lieutenant Ladislaus von Janik of the Thirteenth Austrian hussars, who was taken prisoner by the Russians on the night of Dec. 11 and who subsequently escaped.

"It was a very dark night," writes Lieutenant Janik. "So dark that it was impossible to see friend or foe. Toward morning our trenches were attacked suddenly by a large force of Russians. I was wounded and taken prisoner. I received very kind treatment and was taken to a house where I had the luxury of sleeping under shelter, even though it was only on the barn floor. I was hungry, the guards were hungry, also, but they were kind enough to give me a share of the little that they had to eat.

"The Russians were forced to retreat, and I marched with them on the road to Tarnow. The commander, who saw my condition, was so kind and sympathetic that he had me placed in a wagon, so that I was greatly relieved. During the journey one of the Russian soldiers took my cane from me. I complained to an officer, who immediately ordered the soldier to restore my cane, at the same time giving him a couple of vigorous slaps in the face.

"I remained in Tarnow until Dec. 17 under guard of four soldiers. While the soldiers were having tea that afternoon I managed to leave the room unobserved and made my escape. On

The way to glory's bloody and brief.

Clean from his baptism of blood,
New from the fire he springs again,
In shining armor, bright and good,
Beyond the wise home keeping men.

Somewhere tonight—no tears be shed!
With shaking hands they turn the sheet
To find his name among the dead—
Flower of the army and the fleet.

They tell with proud and stricken face
Of his white boyhood far away—
"Our splendid son is dead!" they say.

SAYS BALLAST SHIFTING CAUSED WRECK OF F-4.

Holland Pointed Out Danger, but Wasn't Heeded, Son Says.

John P. Holland, Jr., whose father built, at the old Crescent shipyards in Elizabeth, N. J., the first Holland submarine, says that if the government had heeded his father ten years ago the F-4 disaster in Honolulu harbor probably would have been avoided. Mr. Holland assumes that shifting caused the wreck of the F-4. Plans of construction which would avoid this evil were submitted by Mr. Holland to the government.

"In 1907 my father submitted to the government a plan for a submarine which embodied all his previous experience with the underwater vessel. It was ideal in every way," declared Mr. Holland. "At that time he took occasion to point out some of the defects in the construction of submarines and to warn the government against a serious catastrophe, such as occurred in the case of the F-4.

"One of the chief defects pointed out by my father at that time was the arrangement of the ballast tanks. Because of the faulty position of the tanks the boats would dive unexpectedly when the center of gravity was suddenly shifted. Should the boat be running partly submerged with the tank partially full, any movement in the boat, such as the raising of the bow or stern on a wave, would cause the water in the ballast tanks, in obedience to the laws of gravity, to shift forward or backward, upsetting the gravity of the boat. As a consequence the boat would be rendered beyond the control of the crew. Should the boat be running submerged, with her ballast tanks full, the same dive would be caused by shifting of the oil in the partially filled fuel tanks. This, beyond doubt, accounted for the sudden dive of the F-4.

"In order to overcome a situation of this kind, my father had on his boat an apparatus designed to expel the water from the ballast tanks in a few moments. Even if the boat were at a very great depth it would rise immediately to the surface. This idea was, however, vetoed by submarine experts of the government."

METEOR SEEN BY DAYLIGHT.

Shot Across Sky From West to East Near Sundown.

The first meteor New York ever saw by daylight visited the city at exactly 5:30 o'clock on March 30. Though not as brilliant as nocturnal fliers, it was beautiful and startling because of its size, and as the twilight was descending the train of the meteor shone, sparkled, scintillated and glowed in the full pride of its mightiness. Its head was fairly reminiful of what a 42 centimeter shell should look like as it goes flying through the air.

The meteor shot across the sky from west to east as one saw it from the financial district. It was visible for about twenty degrees, and its train remained in sight for a couple of seconds. The head seemed about twenty times the size of Venus. It was chiefly a glowing white with a bluish gray border. The train did not spread out like that of a comet, but graduated to narrower proportions and evanesced into atmospheric nothingness.

It looked to observers as if it were too big to burn out before reaching the earth. It shot through the sky at an angle of about twelve degrees and was about fifteen degrees above the earth when the fascinating brilliancy disappeared.

SHE'S WORLD'S BEST COW.

Friesen Fayne Gives Eleven Tons of Milk In Year.

The revised figures of an official test of 365 days at the Finderne farm of the Somerset Holstein Breeders' company of Somerville, N. J., show that Friesen Fayne is the world's greatest cow. In the year she gave 24,600 pounds of milk, containing 1,116 pounds of butter.

The previous world's record for a Holstein cow was 21,000 pounds of milk and that of a Guernsey 24,004 pounds of milk. But the value of the milk is based on its butter, and Friesen Fayne has produced 165 pounds more butter than either of the previous world's record cows.

RUSSIAN ARMY HAS BEEN WELDED INTO SPLENDID FIGHTING MACHINE

Peasants, Enthusiastic, Become Good Soldiers With Surprising Rapidity.

Life They Lead Develops In Each Some Degree of Native Shrewdness.

THE Russian army is gradually shaping into one of the mightiest war machines the world has ever seen, writes Granville Fortescue in the London Telegraph. Before the outbreak of hostilities it was but the raw material of an official fighting force. Now, after seven months of trying field work, it becomes in the widest definition of the word an army. Millions of uniformed moujiks have been molded into a homogeneous organization and trained to carry on the infinite variety of detail demanded by a state of war.

The Russian peasant develops into a good soldier with surprising rapidity. In the first place, he is a splendid physical specimen. Again and again when passing a Siberian or Odessa regiment I have noticed with care separate soldiers and found them all to be pictures of health. In trench fighting perfect physical condition is absolutely necessary. I know of an instance where a detachment had to remain in the same trench six days and nights, constantly under fire. The water was above their ankles. They had only such scanty rations as they had been able to bring into the trench with them. During the six days sleep was out of the question except for naps taken leaning against the side of the trench.

A few of the men came out with mild frost bite. Except for this, after a few days' rest, the detachment was as fit as ever. In his daily existence the moujik meets privation and exposure in every form, so the conditions of warfare do not affect him extraordinarily. His life has taught him how to make the best of the worst weather and that hunger and fatigue are all in the day's work.

Shrewdness of Peasant.

Judged from a physical standard the czar's subjects are all latent soldiers. On the mental side they are not wanting. The life they lead develops in each of them some degree of native shrewdness. No farmer in any land is without a fund of knowledge by which he solves most of the problems he meets in daily life. The Russian peasant has this same shrewdness, and, as is common with all men trained to live in the open, he knows the country. This quality is especially important in soldiers. Russian officers assure me that they are often astonished at the way their men find back trails over terrain absolutely unknown to them. All seem to have what we call in the vernacular "bumps of locality."

There is no state of existence that makes greater demands on the faculties than war, and their constant exercise, where a mistake may mean death or captivity, has quickened the mind of the plodding peasant. Also he has begun to appreciate the sport of war. A corporal and his squad in the somewhat informal Russian way asked to see their commanding officer. It was the night before the Russian new year. Only that day they had been brought back from the front to the reserve trenches.

"What is it, my children?" The Russian captain is the father of his company.

"Tomorrow is New Year's day, well born." The corporal shifted from foot to foot like a small boy asking an unusual favor.

"Yes?"

"We should like permission to go out tonight and dutch a few of the foe. It would be a new year well begun."

It was just the sort of request I should have expected from some of my Irish noncommissioned officers in other years, but it was not what I was led to expect in the Russian army. These men had found a hidden trail leading into the enemy's lines and were so con-

Idient of their own ability that they would risk crossing into the enemy district in order to bring back two or three captives.

Obedience Cardinal Trait.

One of the finest traits of the Russian soldier is his obedience. Put him in a trench, tell him to stay there, and you can depend upon him to stick to his post until he is blown or bayoneted out of it. At bottom he seems to be a good deal of a philosopher, this Ivan the soldier, and his habitual point of view makes him indifferent to the worst accidents of fighting. He will come out with a leg and an arm gone, and his only comment will be "Nitchevo" ("It does not matter"). Of course he lacks what is termed book learning, but this is compensated for by his native cleverness, and, take him all in all, there is no better straw with which to make the bricks of an army than the Russian peasant.

The regiments which I have seen are splendidly equipped. From cap to boots their uniform is especially designed to withstand the severest tests of Russian weather. Some of the regiments wear a forage cap of a design similar to that worn by the English troops, but the characteristic head covering is the "pahpaha." This is a round sheepskin cap about six inches high, so cut that the back of it can be unhooked and drawn down to protect the neck and ears. In addition to this practical cap, the men have a "bashlyk," which is a woolen hooded muffler. With his pahpaha well drawn down and his bashlyk drawn over it, and the tails wound around his neck, no more than the Russian soldier's eyes are exposed.

Munitions of High Quality.

For serviceability there is no garment superior to the Russian army overcoat. It is reddish gray in color, a shade which fades into the landscape. In cut and texture it combines smartness with warmth. After the coat the best part of the Russian soldier's uniform is the boots. The Russian military boot has been copied by the German army, and that is stamp enough of its quality. His tunic and breeches are serviceable, and the rest of his clothing is of surprisingly good material. There is little to criticise in his equipment. The rifle is the equal of the arm of any other nation. The bayonet, which is a long, wicked looking triangular blade, is always carried fixed. This gives a marching regiment of Russians a very formidable appearance. He carries his ammunition in a bandolier and also in canvas pockets.

Since present day fighting calls for an enormous expenditure of ammunition it would be better if he could carry more cartridges than he now does on his person. To provide against any shortage, however, boxes of 500 cartridges are issued to each company intact. I have counted ten of these boxes to a company marching through Warsaw. They are carried in the original packages, a box swinging between two men, who seem to make little work of this addition to their burden.

Each man carries a half of a shelter, or, as it is familiarly called, "dog" tent, with jointed poles. Small as they are, these tents afford welcome protection against the weather. Some of the regiments are provided with copper cooking pots, although certain authorities condemn this metal. The Russian is very much attached to his own teakettle, and one out of every five marches jauntily along with the family pot slung to his belt. Intrenching tools are distributed in the customary proportion among the soldiers. They are of accepted design and weight. The men carry their blankets rolled and slung from the shoulder, after the American fashion, the haversack balancing the blanket. The complete pack is equal in weight to the German equipment.

SAVES DEER FROM WOLVES.

Hunter Comes to Rescue of Buck Making Last Stand in Corner.

A battle between two big timber wolves and a buck deer was interrupted by Gus Harrkonson, a farmer, who was on his way to Gilbert, Minn.

Harrkonson declares that the wolves had the buck cornered in a wood lot with his back against a tree. The buck, with head down, was on the defensive and made no attempt to attack his enemies.

Harrkonson, who was unarmed, went back to a farmhouse to borrow a rifle. On his return the wolves scented him and ran in different directions. Harrkonson shot at the wolves, but missed. The deer did not move away for some time after the wolves disappeared.

Women to Be Railroad Porters.

The Great Central Railway company in England has this week begun experiments to see how far women can be employed as railway porters, to set free men of military age. Other lines will follow the Great Central's example, it is expected, if the women prove equal to the work.

DOG IS HERO OF TRENCHES.

Rescues His Soldier Master From Almost Certain Death.

One of the best dog stories of the war and with the additional merit of being true is told by an attache of the American hospital at Neuilly. A dog named Fend l'Air, belonging to an Algerian soldier called to the colors, managed to get on board the packet's ship and landed at Marseilles. The dog crossed France to Belgium, stuck to his master in the great retreat and also in the victory of the Marne and shared the life in the trenches.

One night the trench was blown up by a shell and the man buried, badly wounded, in the fallen mass of earth. Fend l'Air scented out the exact place where his master lay, started digging and at last got his head clear and barked continually until he summoned stretcher bearers. They dug the wounded man out of the earth, and he was taken eventually to Neuilly, to the American hospital, although it is so as to admit the dog as well as master. The man is now well and owes his life directly to the fulness of Fend l'Air.

OSWEGO CANAL OPENS MAY 15

General Wotherspoon Determined to Inaugurate Short Cuts in Time and Money

By FREDERIC T. CARDOZE

Albany, April 8.—The Oswego Canal, which runs from Syracuse to Oswego, is to be opened on May 15, after having been closed for four years. According to General W. W. Wotherspoon, State superintendent of public works, the Erie canal will also be opened for traffic on the same date. Within a few days he will announce the appointments of lockmasters, locktenders and assistant lockmasters. Because electric locks have been installed on the canals of the State, the old employees which once operated them will no longer be employed unless they have passed the examinations conducted by the State civil service commission.

According to the department of public works, the Champlain canal and the Seneca canal between Montezuma and Cayuga Lake and Waterloo and Geneva, will be ready for traffic by May 15 too. Owing to work on the barge canal, the Cayuga and Seneca canal will not be opened until later in the season.

When canal navigation is resumed, it will be found that many important improvements have been made. The old structure known as the Mohawk Aqueduct, which for nearly three-quarters of a century has carried the Erie canal over the river at Crescent, will be employed and the opening of this section of the bage canal will do away forever with the historic "sixteens," by which the flight of locks in the city of Cohoes which carried the canal up and over the steep hill are known. In place of these sixteen locks, five new structures known as the Watervliet flight, operated by electric power obtained from the dam, will be used.

This season canal boat fleets coming up the Hudson river and westerly bound, will enter the barge canal at Waterford, pass through the so-called land cut and the Waterford flight of locks to the Mohawk river pool at Crescent. Proceeding westerly over the Crescent pool, they will reach the Vichers Ferry Dam, at which point they wil be locked into Vichers Ferry pool through the large lock at the end of the dam, which is to be placed in commission.

At Rexfords Flats, westerly bound boats wil be passed into the present Erie canal and will continte on their westward trip along the same route as was followed last season. At different points, however, the competed barge canal wil be utiiized. These sections are principaly between Wayneport and Macedon and between a point a few miles west of Rochester to Lockport.

The two new barge cana locks at Lockport will very likely be used although the five combined ocks at this pace wil not have been destroyed; they are to maintained for the passage of smaller craft.

Twenty-five miles of canal navigation will be provided ,fifteen miles of which will be river navigation if the present plans at Crescent are successfully accomplished at the opening of the season. The advantage to canal users of this route will be the shorter length of time consumed in the trip between Crescent and the Hudson river.

The passing of boats through the sixteen locks at Cohoes has been ever a long and weary task and it is estimated that to pass through the five locks on the Waterford land-cut, will consume little more than one-quarter of the time. It is not the intention of the State, however, to do away with the present Erie canal through Watervliet, but under a legislative act, passed in 1913, the retention of the canal from Waterford all the way down to the Lumber District at Albany, was authorized. The effect of Watervliet will be that the through traffic on the canal wil pass from Waterford to the Hudson river without passing through that city.

GREAT CAREER OF LORD ROTHSCHILD

Astonishing Speculation Formed Basis of Wonderful Fortunes.

FORBEAR SAW INTO FUTURE.

Death of Croesus Baron Recalls Origin of Family, Its Curious and Apparently Harmless Intermarriages and Its Spread to the Control of the Financial Capitals of Europe.

Baron Nathan Mayer Rothschild, head of the English branch of the great banking family and titular head of all the Rothschild connection, who died at his home in London, was the first Rothschild to be raised to the peerage of Great Britain.

His death recalls naturally the origin of the family, its astonishing speculations, its curious and apparently harmless intermarriages, its spread to the control of the financial capitals of Europe and its rise socially. The first of the Rothschilds was Mayer Amschel, called Rothschild, who lived in the ghetto at Frankfort-on-the-Main. As he lay dying he called his five sons to his bedside and commanded them to be loyal to the faith of Moses, to remain united to the end, to intermarry and to obey their mother in all things.

The wise old man, who had already made his hand felt in the bourses and chancelleries of Europe, parceled out the continent as a conqueror divides subjugated territory. To London he sent Nathan Mayer, grandfather of the Lord Rothschild who died in his Piccadilly mansion. To Vienna went Solomon. Charles was directed to Naples to found the Italian branch of the family, while Jacob James Mayer, one of the great Rothschilds, the railroad builder of France, became the head of the Paris house. There were five daughters also.

Got Exclusive News Early.

Perhaps the first of the English Rothschilds, Nathan Mayer, was the greatest financial genius of the family. His greatest achievements were based on getting exclusive news earlier than anybody else. To get such rapid advance information he established a service of carrier pigeons. The world is familiar with his achievement at the time of the battle of Waterloo. He was in Paris when he received private information that Napoleon had been defeated. He drove in hot haste to the battlefield, verified the story, reached England and London in incredible time for such days, employed agents to buy up government consols and such stocks as were certain to advance with the news of British triumph and made as a result a vast fortune. He lived like a prince and entertained royalty. He had a superstition that bad luck was contagious, and he would have nothing to do with unsuccessful persons. He left a fortune of £18,000,000 ($90,000,000).

He was succeeded by his son Lionel, who bore an Austrian title of baron. He did much toward advancing the prestige of the house. He arranged immense foreign loans, helping among other things to fund the debt of the United States government after the civil war, advancing £4,000,000 to the British government to purchase the Khedive Ismail's canal shares in 1875 and after the Franco-Prussian war heading the syndicate of bankers who agreed to maintain the integrity of foreign exchange, thus facilitating the payment of France's huge indemnity.

He was the first Jew to be elected to parliament, an honor which he obtained in 1847, but it was not until 1858 that the law was so amended that he could take his seat by giving oath on the Old Testament alone, as he had persistently insisted upon doing.

Upon his death in 1879 the headship of the Rothschilds fell to the late Lord Nathan Mayer, who in 1876 had inherited the baronetcy of his uncle, Sir Anthony, and who was himself raised to the peerage in 1885. Lord Nathan was widely known for his great wealth and his philanthropic labors. His town house in Piccadilly as well as his great country seat at Tring Park, Herts, was famous for brilliant gatherings of persons socially prominent. He was educated in England and in 1867 married Emma Louisa, daughter of Baron Mayer Carl de Rothschild of Frankfort-on-the-Main.

Intermarriages All Right.

It is one of the most extraordinary facts about the Rothschild family that there could have been so many intermarriages without a weakening of the virility and a dulling of the genius of the race. Baron James, head of the Paris branch for many years, married his niece. Baron Lionel of London married his first cousin. Alphonse, the successor of Baron James, married Evalina, daughter of Baron Lionel.

Lord Rothschild is survived by Lady Rothschild and their three children—the Hon. Lionel Walter, heir to the barony; the Hon. Charlotte Louisa Adela Evalina, who is married to Captain Clive B. Behrens of the Royal artillery, and the Hon. Nathan Charles. It is the latter who will succeed. It is supposed, to the active headship of the financial affairs of the English house once the new Baron Lionel is not a business man in any sense, but is noted for scientific attainments, particularly in zoology.

How to Detect and Prevent Foot and Mouth Disease

Following its recent statement about the foot and mouth disease and methods for its control, the state veterinary college at Cornell gives additional information to indicate to farmers how the disease may be known and what should be done in case it is present.

The foot and mouth disease attacks cattle, sheep and swine, and is marked by eruptions in the mouth, on the udder, and on the feet. These eruptions consist of blisters which vary in size and contain a clear liquid which later becomes grayish in color. As the disease progresses the saliva of the animal becomes frothy and ropy. Even before the saliva is formed the infected animals are likely to grind their teeth, or make sucking or smacking noises with their mouths, and sometimes it is possible to detect the presence of the disease by noting these sounds when the quarters of an infected herd are entered.

This disease develops rapidly and has a rapid course; there is little or no immunity following one attack, so that cattle may suffer from the second and even third attacks within a few weeks. The virus of the disease is known to be present in the liquid which fills the characteristic blisters. This virus may be transmitted directly from diseased animals to others, and may be spread indirectly through the litter on the stable floor, from mangers, from pastures, from forage, from drinking water, or on roads or from railroad cars on which diseased cattle have travelled. It may also be transmitted through the hands or clothing or shoes of attendants.

Carelessness Means Loss

The authorities point out that carelessness on the part of the individual will mean continued loss; and they state that the disease will spread and that the quarantine will have to be maintained to limit farming and intercourse between farms so long as this carelessness and indifference continues. This fact applies especially to those living near and within the quarantined districts. Eradication of the disease depends mainly, according to the authorities of the veterinary college, upon the enforcement of precautionary measures to prevent the spread of the virus. Briefly, every farmer should, for the purpose of self-protection, hold his animals as in strictest quarantine,and persons, dogs, cats and even birds should be kept from coming in contact with his animals or the places where they are kept.

The Use of Disinfectants

The use of disinfectants in and about the stables is strongly advised, and it is recommended that some receptable containing a disinfectant solution should be placed at all doors leading into the stables, and persons entering should be required to disinfect their shoes or boots when passing and out. It is even recommended that disinfectants should be placed at the farm gates and entrance to the pastures. A barrel cut so that it will hold three or four inches of disinfectant solution, makes a satisfactory receptacle.

The following disinfectants are recommended:

A 5 per cent solution of pure carbolic acid (7 ounces to one gallon of water)

Chloride of lime, U. S. pharmacopoeia (30 per cent available chlorine. 1 pound to 3 gallons of water)

Formaldehyde (1 quart 40 per cent solution to 5 gallons water)

A 3 per cent solution of cresol compound (4 ounces to 1 gallon of water)

If it is necessary to bring animals to a farm they should be walked through a disinfestant and the coat should be sponged with the same disinfeutant. In and near quarantined regions it would generally pay to construct a temporary vat through which the animals should pass in getting to and from the farm. When horses are driven from the farm to a village o any outlying community, their feet should be thproughly disinfected on returning. In short, the college authorities say that the free use of disinfectants should become a farm and neighborhood watchword.

It is urged that all owners of stock should realize that the financial loss is borne, not alone by the livestock owner, but by everyone within the state. The cities and villages are to a large extent dependent upon the livestosk interests which surround them, and in a state pre-eminent in the dairy industry as New York is, it is pointed out that every interest should dictate a roused and united action. If questions of sentiment, or prejudice, or indifference are allowed to modify drastic action on the part of cattle ownes, the state college authorities say that the state will be staggered with the amount of losses which will be involved, and that care and daily attention to precautionary measures will checn the disease and eventually eliminate it. Without these they hold no hope that it can be stopped without widespread and terrible loss.

TIGER PITCHER HELPED TO DEFEAT COLGATE

Princeton, N.J., April 8.—The Tigers kept up the good showing made on the Southern trip by defeating Colgate here yesterday, 7 to 1. Dunc Chaplin, a sophomore, made his debut as a Princeton pitcher, and allowed only six scattered hits. The visitors' only run came in the escond inning through a base on balls to Dwyer, a sacrifice and Edgerton's single. Hicks was hit bard throughout the game. The attack was led by Douglas, who drove in four of Princeton's runs with a triple and double.

RUSSIAN FORCES UNITED; FIGHTING BATTLE ALONG FRONT OF 200 MILES

London, April 9.—Frederick Rennett, the Daily News correspondent at Petrograd, telegraphs:

"By moving a strong force along the southern forks of the Beskid mountains the Russians have converted the operations of separate columns invading Hungary into a general battle, which is now developing across a broad front. Great masses of infanry are pressing slowly into the Hungarian valley and the Russians are approacing the broad roads which converge through the best farming land in Hungary.

"Great reinforcements, both Austrian and German, are filling the prepared defensive positions, and a large number of forts have been thrown up to protect the southern roads.

"The present battle extends neatly a hundred miles practically due east and west. It should prove the most decisive struggle of the campaign so far since it is impossible for it to end in an entrenched deadlock like the battles in Poland and Flanders."

NEW POSITION TAKEN NEAR WESTENDE

Rotterdam, April 9.—Messages reaching me from the frontier state that the infantry of the Allies have been making vigorous attacks in the region of Lombaertzyde and have succeeded in establishing a new position further north toward Westende. At points between Dixmude and the coast the opposing infantry are separated only by the river Yser, while south of the town the trenches are only fifty yards apart. The Germans have resumed the throwing of hand [illegible] in this region.

LATE WAR BULLETINS

FRENCH

Paris via London.—The following official statement regarding the progress of the campaign was issued by the French War Office:

"Despite the continued bad weather fresh successes were won yesterday and today between the Meuse and the Moselle. At Les Eparages a night attack enabled us to make a step in advance, and we have maintained our progress notwithstanding three violent counter attacks. We have already counted on the field more than a thousand dead bodies of Germans.

"Further to the south, near Lamorville, in a spirited infantry action, we killed all except ten of a German company, and these we took prisoners.

"In the Ailly Wood we carried additional trenches and repulsed two counter attacks. In the Forest of Montmare, north of Flirey, we gained a footing in the enemy's defence works and held our ground there in spite of the efforts the enmy made to regain them.

"To the northeast of this wood the cable of a captive balloon was severed by one of our shells and the balloon drifted across our lines toward the southeast.

"To sum up:—The offensive reconnoisances and attacks which we have carried out since April 4 between the Meuse and the Moselle have produced the following rssults:

"First—On the northeast and east fronts of Verdun we have gained on a front of twenty kilometres (about twelve and one-half miles) from one to three kilometres and occupied the heights that dominate the course of the Orne River, and have carried the villages of Cussainville and Fromezey.

"Second—On the heights of the Meuse, at Les Eparges, we have carried almost the whole of the strong position held by the enemy on the plateau which commands Combres, and we retain the ground captured in the face of numerous and very violent counter attacks.

"Third—Further to the south, near St. Mihiel, we have captured the entire southwestern portion of the Ailly wood, where the Germans were strongly established. This they have been unable to retake, despite repeated counter attacks.

"Fourth—In Southern Woevre, between the Forest of Montmare and the Forest of Le Pretre, we have gained on a front of seven to eight kilometres a distance of three kilometres (nearly two miles) and have taken from the nmy the villages of Fey-en-Haye and Regnieville.

Petrograd, Thursday, via London.—The War Office today issued the following official communication:

"In the Carpathians our troops are progressing. In the valley of the Ondawa on April 6 we dislodged the Austrians from the sector of Stroko-Puczacs.

"In the direction of Mezolaboroz the Austro-Germans, having received considerable reinforcements, attempted to develop an offensive, but our troops, after having occupied the front of Czabalocz-Szuko, repulsed all their attacks and inflicted heavy losses on the enemy.

"In the region north of the railway at Ugok and Berezna our troops succeeded in crossing the principal chain of the Carpathians, thereby attaining important [illegible] in the heights south and north of Volasats.

"On the other portions of the front there has been no important change."

"April 6 our troops threw back the Turks along the whole line between Olti and Artvin.

TOWARDS THE PEACE THAT SHALL LAST

Society has probably never before been self-conscious enough to note carefully the subtle reactions of war, inevitably disastrous to the humane instincts which have been asserting themselves in the social order.

* * *

Whatever the outcome of the conflict, the people of the new world are concerned that certain things in the civilization of Europe and in each of the warring countries, shall not perish.

* * *

Though the United States must, as a non-combatant nation, maintain a neutral attitude, so much is at stake in both war and reconstruction, that on the day when, as President Wilson has said, the nations of Europe come together for settlement, Americans should, as freemen and democrats and peace-lovers, express themselves in some affirmative way.

This statement of principles is the outgrowth of meetings through which some of those who deal with the social fabric, sought in humbleness and quiet to clarify their minds and make ready to act in concert.

LEGISLATIVE GOSSIP

By FREDERIC T. CARDOZE

Albany, April 9.—Expectation as to what recommendations, if any, with regard to the findings of the joint legislative committee which probed the public service commission, will be made, is high in political circles here. Candidates for public service commissionerships in both the first and second districts are numerous and in some instances the initial steps have been taken by candidates who have secured influential support in evident anticipation that it will be urged by the legislative committee that certain of the up-state commission members be removed by the governor.

Although the work of the joint legislative committee is regarded as being concluded and the report of that body affecting the public service commission for the first istrict has been made public, nothing has been announced concerning the decision of the members as affecting the second district commission.

While the excuse is offered that the busy sessions of the Senate and Assembly have prevented the members of the public service probe committee from drafting their findings with reference to the affairs of the second district public service commission, it is hinted that bills are being prepared to amend the public service commissions law. There are, however, at this time few indications of what these anticipated bills will contain. As a matter of fact, it is not definitely known that such measures have as yet been drafted.

It is the general impression that the legislative probe committee will not take any determined stand as regards the necessity of removing any of the second district public service cimmissioners. The report is expected to be far more lenient than that which dealt with the first discommission.

Prominent men from various sections of the State, some of whom are still politically ambitions, have been seen of late about the corridors of the Capitol and it has been noised about that some of them are candidates for the fifteen thousand dollar places still held by Democrats who are members of the public service commissions. The presence in Albany of William Barnes, Frederick Tanner, chairman of the Republican State committee, and other influential members of the Republican party, all of whom are delegates to the Constitutional Convention, has made it propitious for a decision as to whether this or that candidate shall have his ambition gratified.

Although a successor has been appointed to do the work as counsel to the legislative probe committee once performed by Colonel William Mayward, who is now a full fledged public service commissioner himself, there have been no meetings of that committee of a public nature.

The end of the legislative session is apparently but a few weeks away and the remaining bills of importance are likely to cause debate and lengthy consideration and thus compel the attendance of the legislators who are members of the probe committee to the exclusion of attempts to deliberate further upon the question as to whether they will recommend that certain members of the second district public service commission be removed so as to provide for the fulfillment of the expectations of the candidates who are awaiting news.

If nothing is forthcoming from the probe committee within the next week, it is not at all unlikely, many legislators think, that the report when it does come will be mild and there will be no changes in membership of the second district public service commission until the terms of office of the present incumbents run out.

LAND ATTACK BY ALLIES EXPECTED AT DARDANELLES

Warships and Smaller Craft Land Troops--United States Groceries Admitted to Turkey Duty Free

London, April 9.—The Daily Telegraph, in a dispatch from Athens, says:

"Information reached me from Ddeagatch that several transports, accompanied by war ships and smaller craft, were visible on Wednesday morning in splendid weather off Enos. It is supposed the disembarkation of troops is being made along the coast.

"I am informed from Constantinople that typhus is raging among the Turkish troops at Erzeroum and is spreading. The troops apparently are short of ammunition. The Sultan does not want to leave the capital.

"Imports of groceries from the United States into Constantinople and Smyrna will in the future be exempt from customs duties."

FRENCH IN AFRICA READY FOR CAMPAIGN

Paris, April 9.—A new French expeditionary force from Africa is in Alexandria, ready to proceed to the Dardanelles to join in the allied attack on the straits, according to the following official statement issued last night by the War Office:

"The expeditionary corps to the Orient, which was placed under command of General A. G. L. d'Amade and concentrated at Bizerta, a fortified seaport of Tunis, Africa, to perfect its organization, has effected the voyage of the Levant under the best of conditions. It had been ready since March 15 to aid the allied fleets and British expeditionary corps.

"In waiting it was deemed advisable not to prolong the stay of the troops aboard the transports, and for this reason the hospitality of Egypt was accepted.

"The French forces have been debarked at Alexandria and are installed at Ramleh, where they are resting and perfecting their organization and cohesion. They are ready to proceed without delay to any point necessary."

LATE WAR BULLETINS

GERMAN

London, Thursday.—The German official report of today on the progress of hostilities, as received from Berlin, is as follows:

"The fighting between the Meuse and the Moselle continued yesterday. In the plain of the Woevre, east and southeast of Verdun, all French attacks failed. In the Combres hills forces of the enemy, which have at certain places penetrated into our outer trenches, were driven back by a counter attack. Battalions of the enemy which advanced against our positions from the wood of Selouse, north of St. Mihiel, were driven back into thef orest with very heavy losses.

"Bitter fighting at short range again is going on in the Forest of Ailly. In the forest to the west of Apremont our troops are in pursuit of the enemy, who made an unsuccessful attack. Their attacks on positions north of Flirey, as well as two evening attacks to the west of the Le Pretre Forest, broke down under our fire and they suffered heavy losses. Three French advances during the night in the Le Pretre Forest failed.

"The total of French losses during the entire front again has been extraordinarily heavy, without their gaining even the slightest success.

"An aeroplane of the enemy coming from Paris was forced to descend in the vicinity of Rethel. The pilot declared no news concrrning the French losses in the Champagne fighting yet had been given out in Paris.

"The fighting at Hartmans-Weilerkopf continues.

"There have been no developments in the eastern arena of the war. The weather is bad and the roads on the Russian frontier are for the time being impassable."

Berlin, by wireless).—The German Army Headquarters today gave out a report on the progress of hostilities, which reads as follows:

"The fighting between Meuse and the Moselle continued yesterday. French [illegible] resulted in failure in the Woevre district; on the heights of Combres, near the forest of Selouse, north of St. Mihiel, in the Ailly Forest, near the Forest of Apremont, to the north of Flirey and in the forest of Le Pretre.

French losses on the entire front again were enormous, without obtaining the slihtest success.

"A French aviator from Paris, compelled to land, said nothing was known in the French capital about the French losses in the Campagne fighting."

FUN RAYS

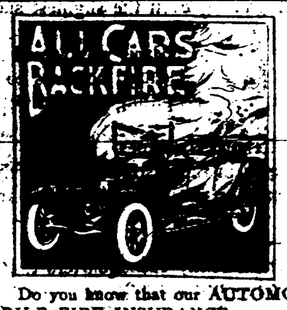
By Ray L. Hoppman

THE FARMER.

THE farmer is a happy man, he "farms" in God's country, where nature's on display. He may not know the city's ropes, as oppy-eyed and green he gropes along the Great White Way. He gets up early in the morn to feed the hens and pluck the corn beneath the clear blue sky. When people say that there's a chasm in living on a well kept farm, I do not wonder why. He gets fresh grub right from the soil and labors at an honest toil, with happy wipe and whi. He has his barn well filled with hay and gets unwatered milk each day. Oh! how I envy him. His good wife baketh home-made pies that bring the lustre to his eyes of apple, pumpkin, mince. The man who lives upon the farm, whose rooster crew the morn alarm, is equal to a prince. He knows Dame Nature to a "T" and how to treat each shrub and tree, each flower, plant and bud. If food goes up, he does not care. His bin is filled with garden ware—the onion and the spud. He has a "hoss" to take him when he must go to town again to sell his choice produce. He sits within his bungalow and makes his healthy "physog" glow by drinking apple juice. He likes the "back to nature" life, away from city noise and strife, where songbirds gayly sing. To live within the city, where there's premiums on clear, fresh air, would make his boltry ring. He may not measure up to snuff on city ways or Broadway bluff, nor knew the latest slang. Why should he worry? He's got his. He's happy in the farming "biz." So let the town go hang.

Opinions

Tariff Needs



One permanent benefit to come to this country as a result of the great war in Europe will be the establishment of manufacturing industries making lines of goods this nation has purchased abroad. The dye industry is one of the greatest in the world. The Germans have had practically a monopoly in this trade. A great Central New York manufacturing concern early looked into the prospect and came to the conclusion that if a proper tariff could be guaranteed for three or four years it could safely invest $3,000,000 in the experiment of making dyes. There being no way of securing such a guarantee the matter was not pressed.

It appears that Thomas A. Edison has discovered processes which encourage him to embark in the business. At his plant at Silver Lake, N. J., he said, he had already made large quantities of the best aniline dyes, and he asserted that it was only necessary for textile manufacturers to follow his example to break the monopoly which Germany has hitherto had in the dye industry.

"Since the outbreak of the war," he said, "I have been making carbolic acid, aniline oil, and benzol. The last sold at 25 cents a gallon before the war. Today manufacturers are paying 60 to 75 cents. Aniline oil was selling at 11 to 12 cents a pound before the war. Now it is up to 70 cents. I am not making very much money in this line, but I thought I would at least make the start, and I hope some of these timid Americans who lack backbone to father a movement worth while will now come along and follow suit.

"The Germans controlled the trade to such a degree that no one else gave much thought to it. But the textile men in this country need not be worried. We can make for them all the primary colors they wish, and more, too. What we need most is a protective law such as Canada has. We should prevent 'dumping' here of foreign goods."

The inventor genius will not be accused of partisanship when he declares that a protective taric is essential to the development of new industries. He praises the Canadian tariff law and he might have included the German tariff law for complement. In either countr ythe great manufacturing concerns could readily secure an agreement with their government for at tariff which would prevent unfair competition while they were building up an efficient force to compete with the world.—Watertown Standard.

A PRETTY GOOD RECORD

There is before the Pennsylvania legislature an anti-vaccination bill, which promises to be buried without ceremony.

In speaking of the bill a physician—a distinguished authority about smallpox, for he has personally treated 10,000 cases, and has seen a vast number of others, says that with the present milder type of smallpox scarcely any person who has been vaccinated will take the disease. The same physician distinguishes the prevailing epidemic in New Jersey from epidemics he has known, particularly one that existed away back in 1870. Smallpox in that year was of the most virulent type, and the physician says that of those persons who had NOT been vaccinated, and who were stricken with the disease, 64 out of every 100 persons died. The death rate was much smaller among those who had recently been vaccinated.

The experience of this same physician is that with the present mild type of smallpox in New Jersey scarcely any person who has been vaccinated takes the disease., Another important point made by the same physician is, that the death rate of persons vaccinated who are stricken is almost zero.

When the physician who has so fearlessly for years worked with the malignant disease was asked how he protects himself, he replied, "By vaccination."

WITH THE SUFFRAGISTS

In Ohio woman is not only denied the right to vote but to swear. In that state a woman may be admitted to the bar and practise law, but, according to Mrs. Gertrude Hendricks a Cleveland lawyer and daughter of a judge, "when she has a simple little paper to be sworn to by a notary, she must chase out and find a man to swear to it," and as though to relieve her mind sshe added, "any fool may be a notary. It takes no long years of study, and yet a woman can't hold that position in the state of Ohio."

* * *

Voting and jury service do not necessarily go hand in hand, as the opponents of woman suffrage have foretold. In Nevada women are now eligible for jury service, not in consequence of their gaining the vote last November, but because of a recent act of the Legislature.

In California where women have voted since 1911, there is a bill before the present Legislature to make women eligible for service on all juries.

* * *

"Kansas women," said the Topeka Daily Capital, "are cutting considerable ice this winter in lawmaking." Now that the harvest is in, it is seen to include the three measures asked for by the women's clubs: Mothers' Pensions, A Child Hygiene Bureau, and a Wage Commission.

* * *

In equal suffrage Kansas men and women have equal rights in the control and distribution of their property. A bill to make the property of husband and wife joint, or community property, was one of the bills that met defeat in the Legislature just closed in that state.

* * *

"The neatly four thousand men who are to be admitted to citizenship at Philadelphia on April 25 must ," so says Alice Paul, head of the Congressional Union," at much sacrifice of time, money, and energy be sought out by the women of Pennsylvania and implored to vote for the woman suffrage amendment next Novemer." and she adds, "It is humiliating beyond measure to American women, as well as difficult, to be obliged to seek political freedom from individual electors."

* * *

Nearly three thousand people stopped to vote on woman suffrage at the "Made in U. S. A." exposition held in New York City. The women voted nearly thirty to one in favor of suffrage and among the men more than seven to one endorsed votes for women.

If this does not show woman suffrage a winning cause, it at least shows that the suffragists are more willing to stand up and be counted than the antis. It shows the antis, if numerous, too inert to be worth championing. The splendid energy of the leading anti-suffragists would seem to be wasted on an ungrateful clientele.

A Vehicle Tax

If there is anything in the present constitution preventing a municipality from levying a tax on motor or horse drawn vehicles for use of the streets, then such constitution ought to be amended and that thing made possible. When the city of Buffalo tried to impose such a tax the court of appeals decided it was unconstitutional. It ought not to be and if this is true the constitution ought to be amended in that particular. Property builds the streets, but only a fraction of property owners use the highways. It is unequal and unjust taxation that makes such property owners pay for the maintenance of such highways for the use and pleasure and comfort of others, without having such use, pleasure and comfort for themselves. It is a tax of the many for the benefit of the few. Probably less than a third of the people of this city own vehicles; they use the sidewalks and they have to pay the entire expense of constructing them. After building the street it would seem only fair and equitable that those who use them and wear them out should pay for keeping them clean and in repair. This can be done by a vehicle tax which would not be burdensome to the individual owners, but would lift a burden from the general taxpayer. It would at least raise a fund sufficient to keep the macadam pavements well oiled and free from dust. As it is now the automobile raises the dust and the fellow without an automobile has to pay for keeping it out of his house. If the constitution prevents this remedy then the constitution ought to be amended so that justice might be done.—Watertown Times.

A Highly Objectional Bill

It is now expected that Governor Whitman will veto the Woods bill abolishing the Department of Weights and Measures. The protests have been so many and so impressive that the Assembly may even hesitate to send the measure to the Governor. For many years the public was cheated by reason of false weights and short measures; the honest merchant was handicapped by a dishonest neighbor who made his profit by a false weight or measure. This State department is estimated to have saved the people fully $50,000,000 by the thoroughness of its efforts.

The Housewives' League of New York city and other sections of the State have protested against the passage of the Woods bill, and the New York Tribune, leading Republican journal of New York city, is making a particularly aggressive, intelligent and effective protest against its enactment. The bill was rushed thru in the Senate as a patronage producing scheme, but it apparently has struck harder going in the Assembly, and the Tribune appears to have some assurance from the Governor that he will not permit it to be enacted into law unless it shows something better than now appears to be its purpose. It is a vicious measure because it strikes at a service which protects the housewife, particularly the poor, from the crooked unning of the knave in business.—Buffalo Times

Elihu

The Constitutional Convention has encountered its first snag—in the pronunciation of the Christian name of its chairman. The name is Christian, that is, by application, and Hebraic by derivation, and it has three syllables, whose values are variously estimated according as the delegate's race, religion or previous condition of skill in menclature inclines him.

Offhand, how would you pronounce Elihu? Or wouldn't you? Some of the delegates in Albany have simply avoided the issue by voting for "Mr. Root" or for "Senator Root," and others, less wise in their generation, have called him Ee-la-hue, and Eli-i-who and El-a-hue and El-hue and El-who and El-ah-who and El-you and almost everything but E-lye-hue, as the dictionary instructs. Indeed, probably a comparatively few Americans have thought of Mr. Root as E-lye-hue. So pronounced the name seems rather a wild one for so quiet a gentleman.

But its old Hebrew meaning, "God is he," makes it in reality an acclamation, and possibly to some of Mr. Root's more ardent admirers an appropriate one in this instance. One hesitates, therefore, to suggest an abbreviation, though that might greatly simplify the problem at Albany. Eli—both vowels long—is by no means an unfamiliar appellation to American ears. Therew as old Eli (Elihu) Yale, for example, who, having the name to begin with, bought immortality for it at the cut rate of about $3,000. In his pictures he wears a great wig, giving him a ponderous dignity. Surely if such an august being may be referred to familiarly as Eli, Mr. Root should not object to a similar liberty. Let the Constitutional Convention consider the amendment.—New York Press.

FARM LETTERHEADS

One of Pat Sandles' points in his farmers' week address was this: Make your farm attractive—the house, the yard, the walks, the roadside, adorning it all with trees, shrubbery and grass, and when it has thus built up a beautiful character for itself give it a name and thus establish an identity by which it may everywhere be known. Make your home a place of beauty, expressive of a lovely life within. Then, when this is accomplished, have letterheads printed with the name of the farm home upon them and thus add to the significance of the spot. It will help along the genuine pride that one should feel for the dearest place on earth. And then have your name and your wife's printed on the letterhead and thus give her a sense of her own prominence in your life and purpose. It will not only advertise your farm, but likewise your generous spirit and happy life.—From Columbus (O.) State Journal.

That you will brag about this town so much that you will have to work for this town in order to keep from being a liar.

That you will take a half a day right now to pick up the odds and ends around the place and turn them into either use, money or ashes.

That you will contribute as much money as you can afford, to any movement to develop the town's success.

BE CHEERFUL

I. E. HYDE
FULTON

Don't tell me that we are too gay; there never was, or is, a day enfolding too much cheer. For when you cry, you cry alone; you can't expect the world will moan o'er one lone sorry tear. For that which is, was meant to be; 'twas all planned, for eternity, and we can't change its pace. But, if you want to cry, why cry; but, tears will never reach the sky, nor win the shortest race. The people who would carve their way work with a will from day to day, nor count their time all lost; they do not cry about their work, nor do they any duty shirk, they're true at any cost. And we who work our own way out, are always sure to hear the shout—"Good luck has come their way." It is not luck, but power of will; a trait of character, and still, some sloth will have his say. But, on we work amidst the cheer of fellowmen from year to year; some day we'll earn a rest. While you, who slump beneath your scowls, and give the world naught else but growls, will never know the best.

FIGURES WHEAT AT 619,000,000 BUSHELS

Department of Agriculture Gives This Estimate of Growing Crops.

Washington, April 9.—Prospects of the winter wheat crop planted last fall on the greatest areage in the country's history are that 619,000,000 bushels will be produced. This estimate by the Department of Agriculture today is based on the condition of the growing crop on April 1. At that date the condition was 88.8 of normal, against 95.6 last year and 87.8, the ten-year average. There was an increase of 0.5 points from last December, compared with an average decline of 2.7 points in the last ten years.

Rye condition was 89.5 per cent. of normal, against 91.3 last year and 90.1 the ten-year average.

The crop reporting board issued this statement:

"The par, or 100 per cent. normal condition of wheat on April 1 may be regarded as equivalent to approximately 16.9 bushels an acre planted, since a condition of 88.8 would indicate 15.0 bushels, which on the 41,263,000 acres planted would give a total production of 619,000,000 bushels as compared with a final estimate of 685,990,000 last year, 523,561,000 two years ago, 399,919,000 three years ago and 430,656,000 four years ago.

"In forecasting this quantity of 619,000,000 bushels, it should be considered as the amount of which the probability is about equal that the outturn will be above or below it; the crop will be larger or smaller than this amount according as the changes in condition from now to harvest are better or worse than average changes from April 1 to harvest.

"In a general way the wheat crop suffered more than the average in the Atlantic coast states as a result of a cold, dry, windy March, without adequate snow covering; in the Central States east of the Mississippi River the crop declined slightly through the winter, but not more than usual; reports of prevalence of Hessian fly are made from many places in this section, which gives some apprehension.

"Great improvement in the condition was made in the western part of the grain belt; namely, in Nebraska, Kansas and Oklahoma, which caused a general average condition on April 1 slightly higher than on December 1, although the average of the last ten years on April 1 was 2.7 points lower than on December 1. In the Pacific northwest large yields are anticipated."

Weights Bill May Pass

Letter to Opponent of Plan to Abolish Bureau

The National League of Commission Merchants of the United States has joined the fight on the bill to abolish the State Department of Weights and Measures. R. S. French, business manager of the league, said recently that in case the bill should pass the Assembly he and other representatives of his organization would appear at the hearing which Governor Whitman has promised and argue for a veto.

The following communication has been sent to members of the Legislature by Mr. French:

"It is intimated that the movement (to merge the Department of Weights and Measures with the Agricultural Department) is prompted by the desire to economize in the expense of the state. I believe that such a movement would be detrimental to the best interests of the people of the state, and we protest vigorously against any action that would tend to reduce its efficiency or lose its identity.

"Realizing the great work that has been done by the Department of Weights and Measures, we would urge that better financial support be given it, rather than limit its operations."

The National League of Commission Merchants has been in close touch with the United States Bureau of Standards, Department of Commerce and Labor, at Washington, as well as with the State Department, and has been active in supporting all national and state legislation for better weight and measure standards.

As an example of its influence there has just been passed by Congress and signed by the President a law establishing a standard barrel for fruits, vegetables and other dry commodities as a result of the activities of the league. This is the first standard measure of this nature ever adopted by this country.

Nathaniel T. McGrane, president of the D. P. Winne Twine and Cordage Company and one of the most active opponents of the proposed change, received a letter from Speaker Thaddeus C. Sweet of the Assembly yesterday in reply to his protests against the bill. Mr. Sweet wrote:

"It is my personal judgment that it would be unwise to change this department to a bureau in the Agricultural Department. It is, however, difficult for me to say at this time anything definitely about positive action on the part of the Legislature."

In reply Mr. McGrane wrote:

"If our representatives at Albany were to study the abuses through false weights and measures practised throughout the State, and the great service done by the State Superintendent of Weights and Measures, we are quite sure the interests of all the people will be so pronounced that there will not be one of our representatives who would dare permit an interruption of the Department of Weights and Measures, but would rather fight to have it made larger, for the service rendered at the small expense to the state today is one of the most substantial investments our people can make.

"Just think. Costing about $20,000 a year, it saves the people through the protection of weights and measures enforcement at least $1,000,000 a week. The handwriting is on the wall, and any representative who does not do his full duty to the people in this most important matter will meet with such disgrace that will prevent him ever again facing the people for re-election to any office."

Word came yesterday to those who are fighting the bill here that those who are pushing it are boasting openly that Governor Whitman is behind the measure and that he will not veto it should it come to him.

COMMITTEE MAY NAME MINISTERS

General Conference May Decide Upon Plan to Give Bishop Appointive Power

Oswego, April 9.—One of the most important steps taken by the Methodist Episcopal Conference is that of taking away from the bishop the power of appointing ministers and placing it in the hands of a committee which would be appointed by the bishop. This question received a lot of consideration yesterday and again today, and before the meeting adjourns it is probable a resolution will be adopted favoring the plan and asking that it be considered at the general conference.

Rev. Dr. J. W. Hamilton of Boston, Mass., the bishop presiding at the conference addressed the ministers at the Trinity church last night upon the subject, "Some people of quality in Boston."

The bishop told many interesting facts regarding the people of Boston, with whom he has associated for several years. Bishop Hamilton discussed in detail the religious work carried on by the Methodist church.

At yesterday's session the annual reports of the superintendents of the following districts in the conference were received and read, Rev. G. E. Miller, Ontario; Rev. David F. Pierce, Mohawk; Rev. Herbert W. Markman St. Lawrence and Rev. Smith W. Brown of the Black River.

A report was presented by Rev. H. B. Fritts, treasurer, showing the receipts in the conference during the last year. A total of $3[illegible] was received, or $800 more than last year. The Mohawk district contributed $11,122; Ontario, $9,268; Black River, $7,6b3, and the St. Lawrence $8,928.

Rev. E. Q. Webster, pastor of the charge at Oswego Canter, won the highesst standing in the conference course. His average was 90 per cent. It was decided by the ministers this afternoon to close their churches to outside appeals.

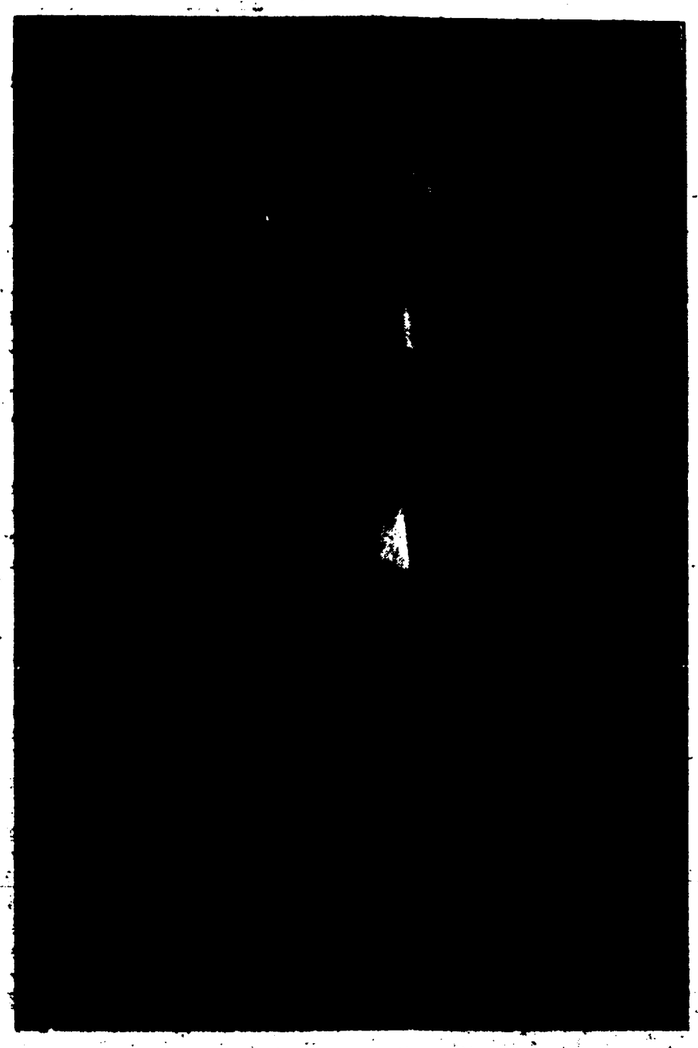
The only appeals that hereafter will be considered are those directly affecting the church and conference.

The celebration of the anniversary of the Epworth League was another feature of to-day's session. Rev. Spencer Owens presided and an address was delivered by Rev. Wallace E. Brown of Geneva.

Today's program was as follows:

Morning—8:30, devotional hour, conducted by Rev. G. L. Powell, Ph. D., of Herkimer, subject, "Readiness for Service;" 9, conference lesson.

Afternoon—1:30, anniversary of the Womens' Foreign Missionary Society address by Miss Estey, missionary to Korea; 2:45, anniversary of Womans' Home Missionary Society; address by Miss Bertha Fowler, president of Folts Mission Institute; 4, Rev. Albert Loucks, Ph. D., will give the third lesson of the series, subject, "The Verification of Goodness."



Evening—8, anniversary of the Board of Sunday Schools, Rev. C. M. Starkweather of Little Falls presiding; address by Rev. M. T. Tremery, D. D., of Chicago.

W. H. ANDERSON COMING HERE

State Superintendent of the Anti-Saloon Lague Will Speak in the Congregational Church Sunday Morning.

William H. Anderson, Superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League of New York, will address the congregation of the Congregational church at the Sunday morning service. Mr. Anderson has been in the State for a little more than a year, and this will be his first opportunity to speak at length before a Fulton audience.

In the comparatively brief time Mr. Anderson has been Superintendent of the New York League, its fight for the Optional Local Prohibition Bill has been pressed forward very viborously to the place where it now is a recognized issue throughout the State and is claiming the attention of citizens generally.

"He drafted the Illinois Local Option Law and built the organization of the churches which passed it. Under its operation over nine-tenths of the territory of that state has become no-license territory. After his Illinois work, he was called by the National League to take charge of the work in Maryland. The politicians and liquor interests in Maryland took him as a joke at first, but he had been in the state but a few days before he had demonstrated such leadership of the moral forces that the liquor interests and unfriendly politicians were compelled to take notice. After six years in Maryland, building a strong federation of the forces, he left Maryland well on the road to state prohibition, and the coming legislative election in that state will be fought on prohibition as the leading issue.

"Some idea of the strength of the movement that Mr. Anderson built in Maryland can be gotten from the fact that during the last two years the liquor interests of that state organized a million dollar campaign fund, with the general counsel of the United States Brewers' Association in charge, to fight against the League legislation. When he left Maryland to come to New York, "The Baltimore Sun," the leadiny daily newspaper of the South, editorially referred to him as being a most astute politician and efficient leader.

"While Mr. Anderson has been in New York for only fourteen months, the League has pressed the fight for the Optional Local Prohibition Bill so successfully that Mayor Mitchell, of New York city, has one out for the principle of local option, and six of the leading daily newspapers of the country have editorially argued for this principle applied to the liquor traffic. The Excise Committee of the New York Assembly, by a vote of seven to six, on March 23d, favorably reported from committee the League's Optional Local Prohibition Bill. A cuple of days later, by a vote of fifty-eight to fifty, the Assembly re-committed the bill to the Committee. Eleven of those not voting on this roll call had pledged before election to support the measure. With this strength in the Assembly, it seems probable there will shortly be interesting developments in the situation at Albany. It is very evident that the liquor interests have no idea that the Anti-Saloon League is going to let up in its advocacy of this measure.

"When this bill passes, it will give the right to vote on the liquor question to the voters in the various political districts f the state—cities of the third class, towns, villages, and voting districts in the greater cities may pass independently on the suggestion of closing saloons. In his address at the Congregational church next Sunday morning Mr. Anderson will tell of the New York campaign and of the national advance."

Letter Carriers in Cities May This Year Save Sweat and Money

An order just issued by the Postmaster-General, it is believed, will enable city letter carriers to purchase cooler Summer uniforms at pices somewhat below those they have heretofore paid. The order provides that the uniforms consist of lightweight, bluish gray, worsted or serge "composed wholly or in part of wool or cotton." The quoted phrase is added to the former regulation and makes possible the ise of all cotton goods. No other change affecting the cut and design of the uniform is made.

CHICAGO'S ELECTION

Chicago, normally a Democratic city, elected a Republican Mayor Tuesday by the unprecedented plurality of 139,024. Republicans everywhere would be more than human if they did not permit that astonishing result to strenghten their conviction that 1915 and 1916 were going to be Republican years. The condition of the country under a Democratic administration and the collapse of Mr. Wilson's prestige during the last session of Congress were, no doubt, reflected in Chicago's great political overturn.

It would be rash, however, to dogmatize as to the extent to which they controlled the result. In Chicago, as in this city, party lines do not hold very taut in municipal elections, and in Tuesday's fight there were many confusing local issues at work. The Carter Harrison-Roger Sullivan feud split the Democratic forces, and the elements which are working to break the alliance between protected vice and crime and the city administration were united behind the Republican nomiitee. Illinois gave her electoral vote to Wilson in 1912, but the Democratic party was even then a weak minority. It is more than ever a weak minority today, and the state's return to Republicanism next year has long been assured. The Chicago upset only clinches a prospect which had already been discounted in the elections of 1914.

We shall be charitable enough to give weight to each and all of the explanations offered for the worst defeat whichthe Windy City Democracy has ever experienced. There is one feature of the catastrophe, however, which should give intense satisfaction to all good Americans, without regard to party. In Chicago the projectors of the New German-American national organization, formed for the purpose of injecting alien quarrels and interests into domestic politicse, had their first chance to try out their un-American program. Chicago has a large population of foreign birth and of foreign descent. There are many Germans, Austrians, Hungarians, Poles, Czechs and Slovaks—all from dominions embraced in the Teutonic alliance.

The Democratic candidate for Mayor, Robert M. Sweitzer, is of German descent, and a circular was issued in his behalf carrying pictures of Kaiser Wilhelm and Kaiser Franz Josef, and appealing for votes for him as an indorsement of the cause of Germany and Austria-Hungary. Some of our German-American publications in this city had called attention to his victory in the Democratic primary over Carter Harrison as a demonstration of the power of the hyphenated voter.

Such an appeal would have made Mr. Sweitzer's defeat inevitable in any American community. The American people, though extremely tolerant of expressions of sympathy with foreign causes, will never allow such causes to be made a basis for party divisions or political action in this country. We do not recognize such issues as pertinent in our elections. The agitators who sought to organize a body of voters here for the purpose of giving a cast to our foreign policy favorable to one of the groups of European belligerents made a colossal error. We emphasized that fact at the time of the conference at Washington in which Representative Bartholdt and other hyphenated statesmen figured. The Chicago election confirms everything which we said. There could be no more grotesque illusion than that the American voter will accept the intervention of foreign influence in his domestic affairs or elect to any office a candidate whose campaign literature (very logically) was stamped over with effigies of monarchs whose sovereigty their former subjects, now voters here, had solemnly renounced.—New York Tribune.

SEC'Y CAPES ASKED PROTEST

Conference of Mayors Work Against Enactment of Five Bills

Yesterday afternoon Secretary A. P. Capes of the Mayor's Conference held a session with members of the Chamber of Commerce at the chamber rooms in 1st st.

Mr. Capes' mission was to inform that body that five bills have been introduced into the Assembly and which, if enacted, would weaken the public health law.

They would, in large measure nullify the progress that has been made in public health work in this state in the last year and half. They would put health work in the state back practically to where it was before the present Health law, urged by the Conference of Mayors, was enacted.

"The decrease in the State's death rate last year is the strongest possible argument," Mr. Capes stated, against any tampering with the Health Law. One thousand infants owe their lives to the educated campaign conducted last summer by the department. Fully two thousand lives at all ages were saved in the State outside of New York city.

The Mayors'Conference,through its secretary, is acquainting each city of the State of the true state of affairs and pointing out the great wrong that would result were the efficacy of the State Health Board be impaired thru the cutting of appropriations for pub-health work.

"We are urging," said Mr. Capes, "that the mayors, the chambers of commerce, health officers and individuals protest by letter that such bills may not become laws."

The interests back of the five bills are unknown, the speaker stated further but that they are selfish interests is an assured fact. The Mayors' conference which works along all lines for public welfare is urging the cooperation of the people, that framers of vicious legislation may receive strong evidence that the public is not indifferent to vicious legislation.

By the expression of Mayor Fox, Health Officer Whitaker and members of the Chamber of Commerce it is assured Fulton will send a strong protest against the enactment of the five bills which would cripple the State Board of Health in doing efficient work.

* * *

Following are the resolutions adopted by the Conference of Mayors relative to adequate appropriations for State Health work.

The following resolution was unanimously adopted by the Legislative Committeee of the Conference of Mayors and other City Officials of New York State, at a meeting in Albany on February 10, 1915:

"Whefeas, the Conference of Mayors and other city officials at its first annual session devoted its entire time to a discussion of the "City Healthful" and as a result was one of the pioneers in the agitation which brought about the demand for the enactment of the present excellent State Health Law, and

Whereas, the Conference has since its organization persistently urged adequate appropriations by the State and Municipalities for public health work, and

Whereas, we recommend the urgent necessity for the continuance of a comprehensive public health educational campaign to secure a further reduction in the death rate, which resolution we note with satisfaction was begun last year, and

Whereas, by the educational campaign of the State Health Department the Municipal Departments are strengthened in their work and without such a campaign they would be unable efficiently tb carry on such work, therefore, be it

Resolved that this conference, acting through its legislative committee, urges adequate appropriations by the Legislature to conduct during the coming year a comprehensive educational campaign throughout the state, and be it further

Resolved, that we request each Mayor in the State and the officials of all organizations interested in public health work to urge the members of the Legislatureto support the health appropriations submitted by the State Commisssoiner of Health."

The Legislative Committee of the Conference consists f the following members: Mayor John B. Corwin, Newburgh; Mayor Joseph Stevens, Albany; Mayor Cornelius F. Burns, Troy; Mayor J. R. Cline, Amsterdam, and Corporation Counsel Wesley Maider, Gloversville.

GUISEPPE IS KIND TO JOHN

Italian, Sued, Helps His Prosecutor to Pay Costs of Action

It is a well known fact that Italians, on the whole, are a kind hearted people, but the acme of generosity was shown this morning in City Court by Guiseppo Torticelli, an Italian of the West Side. Guiseppe, like everyone else, is forced to buy groceries and, in Guiseppe's case, the purchases were madef rom John Cicarella, a West Side grocer. Guiseppe became jobless, but the demand for food and drink did not cease. In due of time, Grocer Cicarella came to collect his bill, and having no coin of the realm, Guiseppe was compelled to refuse payment.

According, Cicarella, took the only course open to him and brought suit. The case came before Judge Wilson this morning. Guiseppe did not seem worried in the least at the prospect and, when questioned about the bill, admitted that he owed it. Judgment was straightway taken against him and, as he had no money, Cicarella was forced to pay the costs. After consulting his pocketbook Cicarella found that he did not have enough money. At this point Guiseppe showed that his heart was in the right place, for drawing his prosecutor to one side he also unearthed a wallet and made up the desired sum. Then the men locked arms and left the court.

FUND SLOWLY GATHERING

Ensign Fitzgerald this morning stated that the goal is far from being reached in the $200 which the army is attempting to raise. Already more than half of the city has been covered by the solicitors and $40 is the amount that has been collected.

In order that the little band of workers may receive encouragement and that the necessary amount be raised to defray expenses incurred during the hard winter season, dimes, quarters and the big round dollars also the rustling checks need to stir a-plenty.

AUTO RACES

The auto fans enjoyed the races on the Endicott tracks in 1st st. this morning. A goodly crowd gath and bets went up fo sixteen to one in favor of No. 9.

The drivers of both machines complained of the excessive dust in the air, and asked various questions regarding the purity of the water from which the streets receive their "wetting."

DISCHARGE FROM BANKRUPTCY

Creditors of Katz Co. Asked for Assent to Firm's Proposition

Judge Ray of the United States Court sitting in Utica, has issued an order requiring the creditors of the Katz company of this city, to show cause why the bankruptcy proceedings begun last November should not be discontinued. The Katz firm has offered a settlement of 25 per cent. on all liabilities of the company and the majority of creditors, it is understood, are ready to accept those terms.

The final hearing in the Katz case, at which the creditors will decide whether or not they will accept the 25 per cent. settlement is slated for the United States court in Syracuse April 22.

Max and David Katz, comprising the local firm, have deposited a substantial sum in a Fulton bank for the purpose of paying all creditors twenty-five cents on the dollar. Refe Wright of Oswego has examined all the accounts and statements of the company and reports that his work is finished.

There are about 400 claims against tha company, the majority of them small items. All those holding the larger claims have agreed to abide by the 25 per cent settlement. The principal creditors ar the Citizens' National Bank, First National Bank, Fulton County National Bank, Harris Amdursky, Sadie Amdursky, Bessie Katz and Mary Katz. Three hundred creditors have agreed to accept twenty-five cents on the dollar.

The entire costs of the proceedings will amount to about $2,000 and the M. Katz Co. will pay this amount.

TO USE WHITE DYES AT MILL

German Expert Installing New Process At American Woolen Plant

During the past few weeks a new eparture has been made in the dye department at the American Woolen mills which should set at rest all rumors to the effect that the mills will shortly close down for a long period. The work for the past two weeks has been on camples and several new fabrics have been experimented with.

In the past work of the local mill has been confined to blue and black cloth. On account of the water here the dyes made here for the blue serge and black cloths have been better than in any of the other mills of the company. Two weeks ago, however, the company sent a German expert here who is installing a new process for making bleached goods. The process at present has been confined to making samples of white serge and other white cloths, but when the local mill gets into operation on its former basis once more, the new process will form an important part of the local industry.

New vats have been built in the dyehouse for the new process and a dynamo has been moved from the big mill into the dye house for the new operation.

Various rumors have been circulated regarding the industrial conditions at the mills. For instance, a Times reporter learned this morning from one seemingly reliable source that the mill would close on Monday for three months. And last night another man who said his information was official stated that the company had just received a million dollar order for shoe cloth. Neither of these reports could be verified, and probably neither one is correct, as the company officials state that their orders come almost daily and the conditions a week from now can not be prophesied.

About Sports Generally

By Frank G. Menke

This story appeared recently in Pearson's Magazine:

"The aim of golfers is, of course, to go round the course with as few strokes as possible, and the man with the least strokes wins the game. A player realized this once, and decided to engage a caddie who would help him.

"Caddie," he said to the boy who came up to him, "can you count?"

"Yes, sir," said the boy.

"Can you add up?"

"Yes, sir."

"Well, what's five and seven and four?"

"Twelve, sir."

"Come along," said the golfer, "you'll do."

And he engaged the boy on the spot.

"An English officer was perched on an observation post in the Belgian sand dunes directing the fire of the British cruisers, which were lying in close and shelling the German lines. The fire of the English warvessels seemed to be singularly effective but with each hit the officer grew more and more melancholy, murmuring to himself. "What frightful damage. What dreadful destruction."

"What on earth are you complaining about?" asked an astonished comrade. "Don't you see that you're giving them the range exactly right?"

The mournful officer pointed to the German line.

"That land over there comprises the best golf course on the continent," he said. "I played over it only last year. And now look what the shells are doing to it."

Just then a shot from the sea screeched over head and the officer raised his field glasses to study its effect. He dropped them quickly.

"There goes the sixth green," he said with a sigh.

The war has reduced golfing to a minimum in Great Britain, writes Robert E. Howard in the Golfing Magazine.

Howard points that Vardon, Ray and Taylor—"the golfing triumvirate of Great Britain"—could not go to war because they were barred by age, and then adds:

"Nearly all the amateurs of military age have answered the call to arms. Yet some of the foremost players are condemned to a condition of passiveness during this war period;; they are young enough to golf, but they are too old for the army.

"Of competitions—even club competitions—there are very few, and it is certain that none of importance will be decided in Britain until after the cessation of hostilities. But while the game here will remain in a subdued condition during the stress of weightier affairs, there is every reason to believe that some of our veterans will compete in the American competition.

"It may be taken for granted that several of the leading British professionals will be found participating in the United States open championship at Balmoral, N. J., from June 15 to 18. At that period, there is hardly likely to be much for them to do at home, and, inspired by the 'business as usual' proclamation, they have come to the conclusion that the best way of 'carrying on' will be to try and carry off the honors of American golf."

HOT LINERS

zz Do you like poetry? No? Well, all right, then listen—
We've had a long wait for that State League meeting—
'Twas expected long ago—
We've had a long wait for Farrell's greeting,
To the boosters of his little show;
But the confab will be held tomorrow.
"Very important," so they say;
We've had a long, long wait for that annual meeting,
Now it's only a day away.

Manager Ganzel, of the Rochester team has left for St. Louis in view of trying to close a deal whereby Dick Kaufman will go to the Hustlers. Ganzel also wants Shortstop Stevenson and Outfielders Clemons and Lee frm the Browns, reports say.

Although St. Louis critics only recently stated that Kaufman would hardly do for the Browns, they have changed their views somewhat after witnessing him perform in more recent games. The star first sacker of the champion Colonels got off to a poor start in the early games, but has improved wonderfully in both his hitting and fielding of late. It is expected that Dick will be retained and will alternate with Jack Leary at first base.

According to reports a special pair of shoes has been ordered for George Burns, the Giants' outfielder, who is limping on a sore ankle, and he may be able to play in the first game of the season. The sprain is mending rapidly and the ankle will be strong to run upon within a week.

Jess Willard, the new heavyweight champion, will get $5,000 for his first week on the stage after winning the title. A contract calling for that amount was closed by Hammerstein's Victoria last night with Lawrence Weber, home representative of Harry H. Frazee, Jack Curley and Tom Jones, joint managers of Willard, who approved the deal by cable from Havana. Willard's engagement begins next Monday. His sparring partner, Jim Savage, will box with him, and a dramatic sketch, containing only brief speaking parts for the champion, is being prepared. The contract gives the theater an option to extend the engagement a week at a time.

Fred T. Greer of Oneida has received a letter from Michael O'Neil, manager of the Syracuse State League baseball team, stating that he would be in Kenwood this week to make arrangements for the Stars to go to Kenwood for their spring practice.

Mr. O'Neil stated that he thought the team would come to Kenwood some time between April 16 and April 20. The Stars will be housed at the Q. C. I. dormitory during their stay at Kenwood.

I thought that I might buy a car and zip around the countryside.
I went to see an agent and he took me for a nice long ride.
Somehow the news got noised around and 15 agents called on me,
And took me out in brand new cars, their points of excellence to see.
This thing went all year around, and really looks, it was immense;
I toured all over half the State without a nickel of expense.
Why should I own a touring car? I am not missing any fun;
I can go riding all the time with agents who would sell me one.

It is easy to say:

Save your pennies, my lad."
That is why my dear dad
Used to say years ago—
"Save your dough, save your dough."

And the coal dealer, too,
And the butcher gets his

And we've anted the price
For the gas and the ice,
And the fuel and the rent,

We offer—To the person showing the longest continuous residence in the city or its vicinity, absence of less than one year, or service in the army or navy not counted against the pioneer, we will send The Fulton Evening Times free for the remainder of his or her life. To the second oldest pioneer we will send the paper for three years free, and to the third, one year free.

STANDING TIMBER.

Rule by Which to Figure Out Its Contents in Board Feet.

The contents of trees in board feet is usually figured by Doyle's rule. This rule is to deduct four inches from the small diameter of the log for slab, squaring one quarter of the remainder and multiplying the results by the length of the log in feet. For example, to find the contents of a twelve foot log twenty-four inches in diameter (inside the bark) at the small end—24 inches minus 4 inches equal 20 inches; 20 inches by ¼ equal 5 inches; 5 by 5 by 12 equal 300 board feet.

Perhaps an easier way to get at the same result is to state the rule as follows: From a sixteen foot log deduct four inches for slab and square the remainder. For longer or shorter logs the contents would be proportioned to the length. In the above case it would be worked out thus: 24 minus 4 equals 20, 20 by 20 equals 400, for a sixteen foot log. But a twelve foot log is twelve-sixteenths or three-quarters as long as a sixteen foot log; therefore this log contains three-quarters of 400 board feet, or 300 board feet. If the log were twenty feet long it would contain one and one-quarter times 400 feet, or 500 feet.

A common way of estimating standing timber is to estimate the length and the top and bottom diameters and apply Doyle's rule, using the average of both diameters and the whole length of the tree.—Rural New Yorker.

Optimist and Pessimist.

In a contest in the Woman's Home Companion the first prize for the definition of pessimist went to Miss D. McKelvey of Colorado, who wrote: "A pessimist is a man who knows the price of everything and the value of nothing." The first prize for the definition of optimist went to Mrs. L. K. Carter of Pennsylvania. Her definition follows: "An optimist is one who thinks the high cost of living is worth the price."

NEW SUBMARINE SCHLEY WILL SOON BE TESTED

There will be no further change of naval policy by the United States until the new submarine, the Schley, has been proved either a success or failure. It will be at least 15 months before this new craft is put in commission, and at least six months will be required to test it. So that it will be more than two years before the Naval General Board will be able to recommend to Congress either a decisive change of policy or continuation of the present program.

It is clear that the United States is being distanced in the race for dreadnaughts, and it is doubtful if she among the world powers in naval strength.

The European war may change the present alignment; it may reduce materially the naval strength of both Great Britain and Germany and the latter country may be reduced to a place far below the United States in naval power. All of this is purely speculative, however, and the situation as it exists at the close of the war might be entirely changed within 12 months after the war.

The real question now before the Naval General Board is: To what extent can the submarine be relied upon to protect American shores against invasion, and American cities against bombardment? The progressive element on the board believes that the submarine solves the defense problem. They declare the new sea-going, fleet-keeping draft of which the Schley will be the leading example, will keep great fleets of dreadnaughts away from American shores. The work of the Germans has conclusively shown, in their opinion, that submarines have made impossible a blockade of German ports; they have kept the mighty British squadrons in the North Sea landlocked for a period now considerably more than six months. Battleships are safe from submarine attack only when moving at high speed, and there is a probability that the development of the submarine will make them dangerous in any weather or at any speed.

The new Schley will be the most powerful submarine in the world, unless German and English craft now building exceed it in strength. It will have a cruising radius of 7,000 miles—in other words, it will be able to cross the Atlantic and return. A flotilla of such craft would make it dangerous for any battleship fleet to venture far from its home base, particularly as it is certain that the existing perioscope will be refined to a point where it will be practically invisible even when the "sub" is only a mile or two away from the dreadnaught.

The American naval authorities are also working on another idea at the present time. It is what is called an armored submersible, or a submarine which is a cross between the existing "sub" and the old Monitor type which vanquished the Merrimac in the Civil War. It will be remembered that the United States navy ceased building monitors at least 15 years ago, because it was found that they were unseaworthy. But a monitor which is heavily armored, which has guns of almost the dreadnaught type, which has speed, and which can, if necessary, sink entirely below the surface of the water, is a craft which would revolutionize all the navies in the world if it were successful. Of course, such a boat has not yet progressed beyond the stage of scientific theory and speculation, but if the Schley is a success it is probable that navy construction experts will soon begin to draw plans and to develop a program for an "armored submersible," as it is called.

American naval authorities declare the submarines has vindicated itself as an almost ideal engine of defensive warfare on the sea, but they are fully alive to the necessity of maintaining American naval strength in dreadnaughts. For this reason there will be no let-up in the program for the construction of dreadnaughts, although, if the Schley is a successful craft, it is certain that the construction of submarines will for a long time to come be a cardinal feature of American naval policy.

COLOR AND MOISTURE.

There Is a Good Reason Why Vegetation Is Mostly Green.

Doubtless many have wondered why the vegetation of the earth is mostly green. That is, not what makes it green, but why it is that color instead of blue or red or purple.

Moisture, it has been found, will be collected by the green foliage in proper quantities while foliage of other colors will not be properly nourished by the dews and moisture from earth and atmosphere.

A rather curious experiment proves this.

Paint a piece of glass yellow, another green and one red and one black and place all these painted pieces of glass out in the open air over night during a summer or autumn night.

When examined early the following morning it will be found that the yellow piece will be very wet and the green piece only fairly moist, while the red and black pieces will be dry.

This is proof that yellow foliage would collect too much dampness, and the red and black would gather none. Green, which collects the medium amount of moisture, seems to be the color best adapted to the conditions existing throughout the earth.

Yellow foliage has been known to damp off and decay under the same conditions that makes green foliage thrive.

A RECORD PRESCRIPTION.

After It Was Bought and Paid For It Lost Its Charm.

The largest amount ever officially recorded as the purchase price of a prescription is £5,000 ($25,000), paid by the British parliament to a Mrs. Stevens to reveal the ingredients of her cure for "gravel and stone in the bladder and kidneys." Parliament voted this amount to satisfy the demands of the British public; also because Mrs. Stevens would not take a penny less for her secret.

The ingredients as revealed by Mrs. Stevens were as follows: "Eggshells, snails (shells and all), hips and haws, ash keys, garden crabs and various other vegetables all burned to a cinder, and the ash mixed with camomile flowers and fennel and other vegetables."

Curiously enough, when this high priced prescription was made public it immediately lost its potency—and its popularity. New cases failed to respond to its magic, and cases which had been cured while its mysteries were still unrevealed promptly developed new symptoms. At the end of a year it was practically forgotten. But its price record still stands; also the record of one instance in which a British parliament failed to get its money's worth.—Los Angeles Times.

Snuff Spoons.

All the world is familiar with snuff-boxes, but snuff spoons are pretty little refinements of which this generation has hardly heard. Very probably they came into use about two years after Sir George Rooke's expedition to Vigo bay in 1702, when he captured half a ton of tobacco and snuff from the Spanish galleons, and snuff thus became a common article in England. One of the characters in a comedy published at Oxford in 1704, entitled "An Act at Oxford," by Thomas Baker, says, "But I carry sweet snuff for the ladies," to which Arabella replies: "A spoon too. That's very gallant, for to see some people run their fat fingers into a box is as nauseous as eating without a fork." In the forties and fifties of the last century snuff spoons were still in use on the Scottish border. They were of bone and of a size to go into the snuffbox. People fed their noses, it was said, as naturally as they carried soup to their mouths.—London Mail.

STIRRING TALES OF EUROPEAN WAR PORTRAY ACTUAL COMBAT

Riderless Steeds at Night Stop on Hearing the Rattle of the British Rifle Bolts.

Many Stories of Individual Heroism — Austrian Captive Goes Through Russian Lines.

APPENDED are human interest stories from the battle front in Europe. They depict actual scenes on the firing line.

"Papa Was Very Sad!"

The Revue Bleue prints the diary of a German sergeant major who had charge of the telegraph service in the Verdun district, in which the following telegram sent by the German crown prince to his wife on Sept. 8 was preserved:

After a hard fight we have forced the passage of the Meuse, always finding the enemy fortified in new positions. This means terrible losses, but we advance. Papa, last night at Marville, was very sad. Von Wedel has been killed. Stenay is beautifully situated, but has been severely treated. I am staying at a pretty house belonging to an old lady. Remembrances.

Horse Sense.

A remarkable instance of horse sense when a number of riderless steeds, broken loose in the night, ignored a challenge to halt, but stopped on hearing the rattle of rifle bolts, is related in a letter from the front.

"We were on patrol along a dark roadway," says a British trooper, "when we were startled by the thunder of hoofs. The sound of galloping came nearer and nearer down the road until the time came to about a sharp 'Halt!' The horses were almost upon us when we challenged a second time. No stop. In a second the patrol released safety catches and opened the cut-outs. At the metallic ring of the bolt sections the horses reared back on their haunches. Advancing with our fingers on the triggers, we found the animals were unsaddled and without riders.

"Later we learned they had broken out of their stable. We had no trouble to lead them into a neighboring farmyard, for they knew what the rattle of bolts meant."

A Brave Youth.

The self sacrifice of German youth for the fatherland takes other forms than death on the battlefield. The following letter from a young German in Madrid to a friend in Berlin which appears in the Vossiche Zeitung gives one incident of such patriotism:

"You remember young Leiderer, who was employed by a concern in Madrid. Leiderer wanted to serve his fatherland and endeavored to reach Germany by way of Italy with several other young men. They were captured by the French and sent to Corsica. Five of them, including Leiderer, tried to escape, but all were caught. They were tried before a court martial, which rendered a verdict that the originator of the plan be shot. But not one betrayed the other.

"So lots were drawn, and the lot fell to Leiderer. The brave young man faced death without saying a word. He died for his fatherland without having been in the war."

The Mined Trench.

Lieutenant Herbert C. Archer of the Sixteenth lancers, who is at London on furlough, explains the heavy losses in that regiment by telling of the mortality in one mined trench. Lieutenant Patrick of the same regiment, who had not much experience in trench fighting, obtained the consent of the commanding officer to make an attack on a German trench on Feb. 20. Lieutenant Archer continued:

"The trench which the lancers were ordered to occupy appears to have been mined by the enemy, but the artful Germans allowed us to occupy it for twenty-four hours, thus getting as many of our men as possible into it. At daybreak on Feb. 21 there was a terrific explosion, which killed five of our officers outright, and another has since died, and five more were wounded. A large number of the rank and file were killed and wounded. Lieutenant Patrick was probably fatally wounded.

"The trench was completely blown in, and immediately after the explosion the Germans charged. Our reserves were called up, and, assisted by those of the poor fellows in the trench who remained alive, we drove the enemy back with considerable loss. We had to re-entrench and were fighting for forty-eight hours."

Superoptimism.

A glowing tribute to the courage and cheerfulness of the British wounded who recently passed through Holland is paid by Dr. Brocx, chief of the

THE KAISER AND GENERAL VON HINDENBURG, THE IDOLS OF GERMANY.

Dutch Red Cross at Maestricht. Dr. Brocx describes his feelings when seeing all those young men so dreadfully mutilated; then he continues:

"But, much as this spectacle hurt us inwardly, we could not let our feelings show in our faces, for their state of mind was quite contrary to our own. If their bodies were mutilated and their bodily strength diminished their spirit was strong and their appearance lively. Gladness rang in their voices when they thanked us for the refreshments offered them by the Dutch Red Cross. They smoked their pipes and sang 'Tipperary' as if they were setting out stalwart instead of coming home thus. In a blind man's violin playing there was feeling, but not sorrow. A man who lost both arms ate his biscuit and smoked his pipe as if he had always done it this way."

The writer thus sums up his astonishment:

"These were men who had lived in a war hell for a couple of months, who had spent months in mortal illness, surrounded by their country's foes, nursed by people who hated their race and did not understand their language, wishes or sorrows, and these men returned as wrecks, and did it all as I saw them, gladly, gayly and without hatred. This is what puzzles me. Is it a special racial trait of the English people? I do not know, but I do know it is a fact."

Austrian Captive Escapes.

The Prager Tageblatt prints a letter from Lieutenant Ladislaus von Janik of the Thirteenth Austrian hussars, who was taken prisoner by the Russians on the night of Dec. 12 and who subsequently escaped.

"It was a very dark night," writes Lieutenant Janik, "so dark that it was impossible to see friend or foe. Toward morning our trenches were attacked suddenly by a large force of Russians. I was wounded and taken prisoner. I received very kind treatment and was taken to a house where I had the luxury of sleeping under shelter, even though it was only on the barn floor. I was hungry; the guards were hungry, also, but they were kind enough to give me a share of the little that they had to eat.

"The Russians were forced to retreat, and I marched with them on the road to Tarnow. The commander, who saw my condition, was so kind and sympathetic that he had me placed in a wagon, so that I was greatly relieved. During the journey one of the Russian soldiers took my cane from me. I complained to an officer, who immediately ordered the soldier to restore my cane, at the same time giving him a couple of vigorous slaps in the face.

"I remained in Tarnow until Dec. 17 under guard of four soldiers. While the soldiers were having tea that afternoon I managed to leave the room unobserved and made my escape. On the outskirts of the town I found shelter in the home of a Jew, who concealed me in a snug little corner on the roof until nightfall. A Polish peasant nearby supplied me with civilian clothes and I was thus enabled to continue on my journey to find my regiment. I had no shoes and marched from village to village in my bare feet. Finally I came to Fryasnak, where I was again befriended by a sympathetic Jew, who gave me shelter and something to eat.

"Twice I was arrested by Russian soldiers as a spy, but I was fortunate enough to prove that I was a Galician farmer suffering from tuberculosis, who was walking in the snow for the benefit of his health. Of course, the many hardships had left me very much emaciated, so that I really did look as if I had consumption. I passed through Jaslo and Dukla and finally reached Lasliska, but everywhere there were Russians, and it did not seem as if I would ever pass through their lines.

"So I tramped back again to Dukla and from there returned again to Jaslo. Finally I fell in with an old gentleman who was traveling to Hungary on a Russian passport, and I went with him as his valet, reaching the frontier in safety.

"I reached my regiment after another two mile walk in the snow and was able to report important information on the situation of the Russians, so that, after all, my being taken a prisoner was a blessing in disguise."

A Gallant New Zealander.

Cecil Humphries, a New Zealander, has won the double distinction of gaining the distinguished conduct medal and of being promoted from private to sergeant on the battlefield.

He was on a visit to London when the war began. Joining the army service corps as a clerk, he was made a corporal and shortly afterward a sergeant before he was sent to France. Humphries' ardent desire to "have a go" at the enemy prompted him to apply for a transfer. By forfeiting his stripes and better pay he was able to join the First Manchester regiment and was soon in the thick of the fighting.

In a letter to his mother Humphries tells modestly of how he regained his stripes and afterward gained the distinguished conduct medal. "I would rather not tell you how it was done," he writes. "I am only proud for your dear sake, and I feel happy to know that as a New Zealander I have done my little bit for my king and country."

Brigadier General Strickland assembled the men and, dismounting from his horse, shook hands with Humphries and congratulated him. Then amid hearty cheers the ribbon was placed on his breast.

Place Light Value on Guns.

Declaring that there has been too much importance attached by the British public to the reports in the official statements of the frequent capture of German machine guns, the British "eyewitness at the front" in a summary of recent events says:

"It must be remembered that to the Germans the loss of one or several machine guns does not represent what at the beginning of the operations it would have meant to us, with our then vastly inferior total and proportionate number of these weapons.

"It is believed that before the war commenced they had available altogether a stock of 50,000 such guns apart from any that may since have been turned out by their arsenals. Their employment of them, therefore, has in a certain sense been prodigal and carried out with a disregard to loss, which is only comprehensible when the large reserve of these weapons in their possession is borne in mind.

"To the Germans a machine gun represents merely a piece of machinery of immense killing and stopping power which has cost a certain sum of money, but it is less vulnerable and less valuable in every way than a number of men and rifles of equivalent killing power.

"The one principle guiding its employment, therefore, is that, provided the gun has earned its keep or paid for its cost by the number of the enemy slaughtered, its loss or destruction does not count."

BET WAR WILL END BY SEPT. 1

Odds in London Ten to One on Peace Before Dec. 1.

BIG SUPPLY OF AMMUNITION

British Expert Thinks That the Side That Can Kill the Most Men Will Win in the End—Asserts That Germany Has a Sufficient Supply of Food to Last Year.

London.—There is probably no question asked more frequently just now than: "When do you think the war will end?" Opinions differ widely, as is only natural when there is so little real information to go upon. Betting in the city is quoted as being, that the war will end:

Before May 1, 1915—3 to 1 against.
Before Sept. 1, 1915—even.
Before Dec. 1, 1915—10 to 1 on.

This certainly indicates a more optimistic feeling than anything said by ministers and other important authorities would seem to justify, though all of these are careful not to commit themselves to anything definite.

Generally speaking, the highly placed authorities are grave in tone, and preparations of all kinds are going on with increasing vigor. Lord Southwark announced at the annual meeting of the Associated Chambers of Commerce that he was authorised by Lord Kitchner to say that since the beginning of the war "we have increased the output of war material 300 times in excess of what it was before. He added that under the bill we were discussing in the house of lords he hoped and expected to get a great accession of labor which would enable him enormously to increase the supplies."

Statements like this and Asquith's recent warning that the war would be a long one seem to suggest that the calculations of those who ought to know best hardly reckon on an early end to fighting.

A high authority said the other day: "This war will only be ended by killing. The allies have to face Germany with a butcher's bill so huge that she will at last refuse to see it increased."

To the question of how big he thought that the bill would have to be he answered, after awhile: "That is hard to say. But I estimate the German casualties up to date at 1,250,000, and that, I think, is barely half what they will have to be. But, believe me, it is only by kill, kill, kill that they can be defeated. The question of food will not enter into it. They have plenty of provisions. It is only by killing their men that we shall make them give in."

He then told me of a remark made by a German officer rescued from the Blucher. "Have your sailors nothing better to do with their time than to save the lives of the enemy?" This, he said, was right in effect, for the death of every German soldier or sailor brought the war so much nearer to its end, but the tradition of the British navy is to save life after the defeat of the enemy.

An interesting article published by a writer whose opinons have often proved well justified gives the result of an inquiry made on the spot into the present conditions in Germany. From a friend in the diplomatic corps in Berlin, who had unusual facilities for collecting the information, he obtained the following figures: There were 6,000,000 ablebodied men between nineteen and forty-five who had not served in the army up to Jan. 1. There were close upon 1,000,000 volunteers, half of whom were included in the Landwehr or substitute reserves. To these are to be added the approximately 4,000,000 now with the colors.

Casualties reported up to Jan. 15 were said by the same authority to be: Killed, 250,000; wounded, 594,000; missing and prisoners, 162,000, making a total of 880,000. An estimate of the losses up to Feb. 1 makes the killed, wounded and missing or prisoners approximately 1,200,000. Allowing for the return to the firing line of only one-third of the wounded, the irretrievable loss in fighting material is estimated at 1,000,000 officers and men up to Feb. 1. Making allowance for another six weeks of fighting, this estimate differs little from the 1,250,000 of the English authority referred to above.

Pasadena Millionaire Gives Consent When His Son Enlists.

Los Angeles, Cal.—Donald Murphy, nineteen years old, son of A. M. Murphy, a Pasadena millionaire, is at Mare island, San Francisco, where he enlisted for three years' service in the navy. Young Murphy drove up to the naval recruiting office in Spring street in his automobile, accompanied by his parents.

"I want to enlist as a sailor in the American navy," he said to the officer in charge. His father and mother gave their consent. He passed the physical and mental examination and then was enlisted. Re-entering the automobile, he went to the Santa Fe station, where he boarded a train for Mare island. Murphy last year was graduated from the Pasadena high school.

ARCTIC FROST BITES.

And the Popular Error That Rubbing With Snow Helps Them.

The idea that when your face or any other part of your body begins to freeze you must thaw it out with snow is declared to be a superstition by Vilhjalmur Stefansson. Few things could be more absurd, he says, and yet this is a superstition that has been carried with many an arctic explorer through long experience in the north. Tales are told of how even the application of snow failed to relieve the freezing, and these are taken as indications of the severity of the case instead of proof that, as a matter of fact, the snow only assists the freezing process. Any high school pupil, Stefansson says, could tell us offhand what would happen if liquid air were applied to a man's cheek or nose. Of course the part would freeze instantly. Snow has the same though less rapid effect.

The whole secret of dealing with frost bites of the face in arctic travel, he says, is to keep the hands warm and to run the warm hand over the face every few minutes to see if any part of it is frozen. Usually, also, one can keep oneself fairly well informed about the condition of one's face by wrinkling it and "making faces." If a spot of skin or cheek the size of a twenty-five cent piece becomes stiff one can always detect it by making a grimace. Then all one has to do is to take one's warm hand out of one's mitten and press it to the frozen spot for a moment until the whiteness and stiffness are gone.—Indianapolis News.

His Blasted Life.

John Grimes, a noted skinflint, residing in a rural district, became engaged to a lady of some means who chanced to be visiting in the neighborhood during the summer. Ascertaining his true character as the weeks passed, she told him all was over between them, whereupon Grimes threatened to sue for breach of promise. Rather than incur publicity and notoriety his former sweetheart, through her attorney, offered to settle for $200. "Two hundred!" shrieked Grimes melodramatically. "Two hundred dollars for ruined hopes, a blasted life! Never, never!" "How much do you think would be about right?" asked the attorney. "Make it three hundred and it's a bargain," declared Grimes instantly.—Argonaut.

Offer Declined.

It was after an attack, and two highland soldiers were lying flat to escape the flying bullets. During a brief lull in the firing one of them said, "Let's be moving on, Jock."

"I can't, Sandy," was the reply. "I got it in the leg."

"Then crawl on tae my back," said Sandy, "and I'll carry ye in."

"Nae danger, fear," exclaimed Jock; "the Victoria cross for you and anither bullet for me."—Boston Transcript.

A Thumb Print Fantasia.

SIMPLIFYING GOVERNMENTS

Object of Reforms in State Governments Is to Diminish Legislation

By Dr. Charles Fremont Taylor

About 40 State Legislatures are now in session grinding away at the legislative mill. During the five years from 1909 to 1913, inclusive, our State Legislatures made 62,004 laws! Such an astounding output of legislation has never been seen in any other part of the world. What we need is not more laws, but fewer, and better.

The average legislator serves only for a single term. During that time there is usually but one session of the Legislature, and in many states the length of session is limited to 40, 60 or 90 days. The average legislator has absolutely no previous preparation for his responsible duties as a lawmaker. At the end of his first term he is usually succeeded by another as devoid of preparation and experience as he. This is true of the vast majority of the members of all our State Legislatures.

When we consider the crude material constituting our Legislatures, we cannot be surprised at the crudity of the product, nor at the awkward attempt to make up for quality by increasing the quantity.

We shall never have a better quality of legislative product until we have a better quality of legislators. The first step in attaining this object is to reduce the number. For example: New Hampshire has 405 members in the lower house; Vermont, 243; Connecticut, 25j; Massachusetts, 240; Pennsylvania, 207, etc. The members of the upper houses are less numerous, none going above 100, but as a rule they also are far too numerous.

Undoubtedly our State legislative product would be better if State Legislatures were to consist of a single body only, of a few members and well paid, chosen with reference to their preparedness and ability for the responsible and difficult task of lawmaking. Why keep the old tradition of two legislative bodies? In the last decade over 300 municipalities have abandoned the old form and adopted a single and small legislative boye, usually of only three or five members.

Uncontrolled authority concentrated in a small body might be a temptation to party machines and corrupting corporations to get control of such body, in which event the danger of legislation in the interest of political machines and powerful corporations would be greater than at present, yet municipalities which have thus concentrated legislative authority have avoided these dangers by providing for the Referendum. No sensible corporation will buy legislation from a legislative lobby which cannot "deliver the goods." The Referendum prevents the delivery of any legislative "goods" not wanted by the voters. In this way the corrupt lobby has been killed in these municipalities, as is shown by the improved character and efficiency of their government. And the Referendum has been actually used very few times. Its mere presence in the charter guards the people against vicious legislation, just as the mere presence of a policeman usually insures good order in a public place.

This brief glance at the improvement in municipal government suggests the proper way to improve State government. A constitutional convention will meet in Albany, N. Y., early in April of this year for the purpose of of proposing a new constitution for the great State. Will this convention break the traditions of the past and provide a State government cast in modern mold? Will it provide for a single legislative body, of few members, well selected, well paid and well prepared for their task? This body would give its entire time to its work and would promulgate laws as needed, and always after the most careful consideration and investigation. One such law would serve the public better than a hundred ordinary laws. Laws would then be simple, easily understood and far-reaching.

The small legislative bodies (commissions) of municipalities have also been given large appointive and executive powers. This is contrary to the old theory of complete separation of legislative and executive powers and responsibilities in the same hands works well in our regenerated municipal governments. It has always worked well in other countries where the separation idea never took root. The concentration makes for simplicity and efficiency, and it is entirely safe when guarded by the Referendum for possible legislative errors or venality, and by the Recall for possible official incompetence or crookedness.

The future State government will be simpler and more efficent than the present State government; and at the same time it will be more responsive to popular needs and wishes. These desirable improvements will be achieved by adopting the plans that have proven successful elsewhere. The separation idea will be abandoned, and greater powers, both legislative and administrative, will be concentrated in fewer hands. But the Referendum and Recall will always be on guard to insure faithfulness to the interests of the general public instead of service to party organizations and powerful corporations. What State will be the first to set this pattern.

New York's constitutional convention will sit in April, and it will struggle with the problem of State government probably until September. The subject of a constitutional convention is being seriously discussed in many other states, notably in Illinois and Pennsylvania. The need is for short constitutions, giving a simpler and more efficient State government. The steps toward this goal are a shorter ballot, fewer elected officers, with larger powers, and with the possibility of direct control by the voters in order to protect against abuse of concentrated powers.

LATE WAR BULLETINS

FRENCH

Paris, via London.—The following French official statement regarding the progress of the war was issued today:

"After a new and brilliant attack the important position of Les Eparges, which dominates the plain of Woevre and which the enemy defended obstinately, is now completely in our hands. We carried yesterday 1,500 meters (about 1,600 yards) of trenches, and this morning the Germans held in strength on the plateau only two isolated positions of some meters. We carried these this afternoon, taking 150 prisoners. We have thus attined one of the principal objectives of our operations of the last few days.

"Further to the south, in the Forest of Ailly, we have maintained all the ground gained—200 meters on a front of 400 meters—and repulsed three counter attacks. In the Forest of Montmare the Germans made fifteen attacks to retake trenches which we wrested from them yesterday. They were repulsed fifteen times. Heaps of German bodies are lying on the ground.

"On the rest of the front actions to be reported are as follows:

"In Belgium, near Drei Grachten, the Germans by an attack occupied part of a trench on the left bank of the Yser.

"In Champagne there have been infantry attacks of quite local but of a very vigorous character.

"British troops repelled during the night of April 7-8 a German attack.

"Between the Meuse and the Moselle fresh progress was made. At Les Eparges we gained nw ground and have remodelled the trenches captured from the Germans, which were chokd with bodies, to make the parapets face the other way, and we repelld at the close of th day two counter attacks made by thee nemy. In the Montmare Wood all the progress we gained has been maintained despite very violent attacks yesterday.

"In the wood at Ailly we captured new trenches and repelled two counter attacks, as already reported. We also secured six machine guns and two trench mortars. The enemy ceased his counter attacks after midday."

GERMAN

Berlin, Friday (via London).The official statement given out today by the German General Headquartes Staff says:

"In the western theatre: The Belgians again have been driven out of the demolished hamlet of Drei Grachten, on the Yser Canal. Two Belgian officers and 100 men and two machines guns were captured.

"In retaliation for the bombardment of villages situated behind our positions the city of Rheims, in which large assemblings of troops and batteries were observed, has been bombarded with incendiary shells.

"North of the village of Beausejour, northeast of Les Mesnil, we took from the French last night several trenches and two machine guns. Two attempts to recapture the position during the night were repulsed.

"A French infantry attack in the Argonne Forest, during which the French again employed asphyxiating bombs failed.

"The battles between the Meuse and the Moselle rivrs continue with incrased fierceness. The French suffered the heaviest losses, but again were completely unsuccssful in their attacks.

"In the plain of the Woevre they also unsuccessfully attacked. During the morning and the evening they continually brought up new forces for the occupation of the Meuse hills near Combres.

The whole southern slopes of the mountains have been strongly fortified, and troops are being poured into the reyion in dispute. It is said there are now twenty-four Austrian and six German army corps facing Russians and that more are on the way. On the other hand, t[illegible]sians are still bringing up reserves, and, according to the Aust[illegible]or of last night, they are attacking without regard for the loss of human life.

AMERICAN KILLED BY A GERMAN SUBMARINE

LEON C. THRASHER

Here is Leon C. Thrasher, the American citizen who was a passenger on the British steamship Falaba, which was sunk by a German submarine. The loss of his life may cause international complications between the United States and Germany. Whether ample time was given for escape and Thrasher was negligent, whether he was killed by the explosion caused by the submarine torpedo or drowned while the vessel was sinking, are questions on which the American government will seek definite information before deciding its course.

STEAMSHIP WITH FIFTY-FOUR ON BOARD REPORTED SUNK.

THE PRINS MAURITS

Here is the steamship Prins Maurits, reported sunk off Cape Hatteras, with a crew of fifty and four or more passengers. Wallowing around in great seas whipped up by the worst storm that has swept the Atlantic coast in many years, a number of vessels searched in vain for the steamer, but nothing was seen of her, and it is feared that all on board are lost, unless some good Samaritan ship appeared on the scene.

French Capture Les Esparges; German Bodies Piled on Field

London, April 10.—"Bodies of Germans lie in great piles along the front."

This sentence in the report of the day's operations, issued last nightb y the War Office in Paris, tells only a small part of the terrific fighting in progress between the Meuse and the Moselle, where the French have attacked in forte to destroy the German salient at St. Mihiel. The battle on the wooded heights and on the plains of the Woevre has developed into the biggest engagement in the western theatre since the end of the battle of the Yser, in November. The German advance on the Aisne at Soissons, the French operations at Perthes, in Champagne, and the British drive at Neuve Chapelle marked important periods in the winter's fighting, but none of them has equalled in numbers of men engaged or in the importance of the objective the French effort to cut off the Germans on the Meuse or shatter the wedge driven to the south af Verdun that results in a three-quarters investment of the fortress.

The Germans between St. Mihiel and the Moselle have all the advantage of the terrain. Most of the territory they control is in the form of a plateau, with sides rising from 400 to 500 feet above the plain. Many of the approaches to the plateau are simply small precipices, up which men can go only with the aid of scalling ladders. Not even this handicap has prevented the French from pushing home their advantages, however. A report of one battle near Les Eparges eaches London in which a French battalion is pictured advancing to a cliff side in the face of a withering rifle and machine gun fire, scaling the cliff with improvised ladders and carrying the defensive works at the point of the bayonet.

Yesterda's fighting increased the French advance, the most important feature of the engagement being the capture of Les Eparges, about which a battle in greater or less intensity has been raging since January. To the south of the German salient and to the west the French increased their territory, according to Paris, although Berlin declares every French attack was repulsed. Paris mentions fifteen German counter attacks on one acptured position, each of which was thrown back with heavy loses.

Military observers believe the German position at St. Mihiel will be untenable despite the support given to it by Fort Camp des Romans if the gains mentioned by Paris continue in the same proportion many days. They are certain the German lines of communication with Metz will by that time be under the domination of the French artillery. When that time comes St. Mihiel necessarily will be either evacuated or left to its own resources. St. Mihiel itself is being continuously bombarded, but because of its peculiar physical situation it is not believed an attack on it directly can weigh heavily in the scale of the general operations.

The Germans have made an attack on the British lines in Northern France, which was repulsed, and have, according to Berlin, recaptured from the Belgians the village of Drei Grachten, on the Yser, which has changed hands several times within a few days. Elsewhere in the west, so far as the public has been informed, there has been no fighting worth mentioning.

The Russian successes in the Carpathians, where the Tsar's armies now are said to control virtually all the important passes and are preparing for a descent of the southern slopes, onto the plains of Hungary, have revived unofficial talk of a separate peace for Austria-Hungary and seemingly increasing anxiety on the part of the interventionists in Italy for their country to take up arms on the side of the Allies and obtain teritory they have failed to get in the negotiations through Germany with Austria.

Except in Italy, the neutral country most directly interested in this question, little credence is given to this report, although the opinion is expressed in military circles here that if Russia succeeds in overcoming the joint resistance of the Austro-German troops in the Carpathians as she apparently has that of the Austro-Hungarian armies Hungary at least will be ready to bring the war to an end as far as she is concerned.

However, t[illegible]ssians have some way to go before they reach the plains of Hu[illegible], and the Austro-German forces are placing every obstacle [illegible] their way.

GERMANS SEND TROOPS TO WEST BANK OF YSER

On the Belgian Frontier, April 10.—The Germans continue their despeate efforts to gain a firm foothold on the opposite bank of the Yser. Yesterday they were pushing forward strong reinforcements from Beerst, with leld guns and many Maxims, fo the purpose of conslidating their new position, but according to the latest accounts, they have only the same precarious foothold across the river that was cautiously described in a telegram from the division commander of Thourout.

Heavy fighting continues in this region of the Yser, where the Allies' artillery is subjecting the German advanced trenches to a terrific bombardment.

The Allies' aeroplanes, flying over Knocke and Lasoute, adjoining the frontier, last night dropped numerous bombs on the German marine stores and depots.

HUNGARY CALLS ON GERMAN FORCE FOR AID

London, April 10.—Frederick Rennet, the Daily News correspondent, telegraphs from Petrograd:

"There are remarkable signs that the most seious purpose of the large German reinforcements now answering the summons of the Hungarian government is to overawe the rural population, which is beginning to threaten revolt. Evidently the Germans cannot well spare troops from the western campaign. Their support to the main Austrian army is falling back along both banks of the Ondava rivet. It is insufficient to bring counter attacks to the point of stemming the general Russian advance.

"The Austrians are dstroying all permanent bridges across rivers flowing into the Hungarian valley, accepting by this action a defensive campaign. The pincipal Russian movement on the right wing covers a forty mile front. It is conducting the invastion from ridge of the Beskids as a fortified base. This reduced front already gives a greater force of impact for the Russian infantry.

"Should the Hungarian crisis burst into civil war behind the amies now facing the Russians, it is certain that Field Marshal von Hindenburg immediately will abandon his lines facing Narew, from the north, and bring his main force from Poland(sending General Mackenzen's forces south again to try to get below the Russian position in Hungary. The Germans in the north now have only one officer for about three hundred men."

The Times correspondent at Petrograd telegraphs:

"Part of the Russian line has experienced a check near Mezo Laborez. There has evidently been a considerable concentration of thte enemy's troops at this point, but the sector involved is small, and all the Austrian attacks made in it have been repulsed. The check can have no great effect upon the Russian advance as a whole."

C. M. ALLEN CO.'S BUSINESS GOOD

One of the City's Oldest Industries Reports Big Yearly Increase In Trade

One of the oldest manufacturing establishments, in this city is the C. M. Allen excelsior works in N. 1st st. The enterprise was established in 1888 and has carried on business ever since. The building occupied by the corporation is two stories high and covers an area of 60x100 feet.

More contracts by one-half than a year ago, are on file now at the company's office. The output for last year was greatly in excess of any other year since the company's wheels began to revolve in 1888.

Each month of 1914 exceeded its corresponding month of 1913 by fifty per cent. The daily capacity of the plant is 100 bales of excelsior or one carload. As the excelsior is stripped by machinery from parts of logs fifty-four inches long and five inches in diameter, there is no necessity for a large number of employes, yet there are thirty to forty men engaged by the firm to operate the machinery in the plant. At present on account of a rush of business a few of the men are working long hours that pace may be kept with orders in hand.

Like many other industries the C. M. Allen Co., complains of excessive freight rates. The freight charge on raw material for making excelsion is higher now than the cost of the wood in Canada. The raw material for the plant is shipped by rail from Quebec, but upon completion and operation of the barge canal the excessive freight rates should be lessened, as the pulp wood can then be sent by water from Quebec to Fulton. It is therefore natural to assume that a reduction in freight will mean a reduction in the cost of excelsior. The market price of the product is about $18 a ton.

There is more or less waste in connection with making excelsior, as a result the pulp wood used for its manufacture must be not less than four inches in diameter. Poplar and bass are the woods used in making excelsior.

C. M. Allen, jr., has just returned from canvassing the south and southwest and reports a successful trip.

In addition to manufacturing excelsior the Allen company makes about 500 butter tubs daily. This is an increase over the previous year of about 50 per cent. Packing cases are also a branch of the Allen company's business, and last year, the firm turned out about 18,000 apple barrels.

Five coopers are employed the year round by the company on cooperage work. In the spring of the year the coopers turn out butter tubs, and in the fall they switch to the manufacture of apple barrels.

The plant is now in full operation, and business in the excelsior line is advancing to the front with leaps and bounds.

The manufacture of excelsior is one that may be said to be the pioneer of early prosperity, and the foundation of Fulton's manufacturing supremacy.

SUES FOR $3,000 REWARD OFFERED AFTER ACCIDENT.

Fred D. Clary, a farmer of South Granby, has brought a Supreme Court action against the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co. to recover the $3,000 reward which was offered by the railroad company for the discovery of the person responsible for the wreck which occurred near South Granby October 17, 1914.

According to the contention of Clary he had employed on his farm a number of escaped inmates of the Syracuse State Institution for Feeble-Minded Children and that one of these boys gave him information which led to the arrest of Charles Campbell, now in the Matteawan state hospital.

Immediately after Campbell's arrest there were several claimants for the reward, which was one of the largest ever offered in this part of the country in a criminal case. Because of the large reward there were many agencies which set at work immediately to apprehend the offenders.

Clary claims that after his conversation with the boys who, it was charged, assisted Campbell in wrecking the train, he gave information to the sheriff of Oswego county and other officials which led easily to the apprehension of Campbell after his escape from this state.

It is the contention of the railroad company that although the information furnished by Clary may have been of some use in running down Campbell, it was not the most important factor leading to his arrest and that other agencies were more effective.

A CONSUMERS' LEAGUE.

What the League Means In Other Cities.

The slogan of the New York State Consumers' league is "a local league in every city of the state."

New York is the greatest industrial state. In 1912, 347,601 women and 13,919 children were at work in our factories alone. Two other, as yet unnumbered, armies are at work in our stores and offices. The exodus from the home to the workshop has been sudden with but little forethought as to conditions of work or its effect upon the worker. This side is now coming to the front. Careful studies show that some things can and should be bettered. Public opinion is needed for this. The local Consumers' league means an intelligent sympathetic, responsive public opinion.

In other cities, the local league means for the children, the initiation of vocational guidance in the schools, the provision of scholarships for needy children, the study of vocational open to the children, protection from harmful street trades, interest in the child labor court cases.

In other cities, the local league means, for the protection of the home, pure milk, clean bakeries and groceries, sanitary workshops, opportunity to purchase garments bearing the league guarantee of safety.

In the stores, the league has stood for the enforcement of the labor law, a weekly half holiday in summer, a Christmas Eve closing. "Help the Grocer and Confectioner" is the slogan of one city: "Consider the Laundry Worker" of another.

The local league means a trusted intelligent body from whom the employer and employe alike can seek co-operation and aid. It issues so that the city plays an intelligent part in the nation-wide movement for high standards in industry.

Every community should have a strong active local Consumers' league.

FUN RAYS

By Ray I. Hoppman

CUPID.

DID you ever hear a wise guy clamor lustily and loud that he'll never fall for marriage to a wise and knowing crowd? And he'll chatter long and freely, until Cupid, on the wing, sends a dart into his bosom with a buzzing, whirring sing. Did you ever hear a maiden sling the chatter in your ear that she'd never let a parson interfere with her career? Oh, she jabbers like a parrot till a bandy legged bloke whispers sweets to her softly—the career goes up in smoke. Yes, you've got to bow to Cupid, be you skinny, short or fat; handsome, shy on looks or stupid—paste this classic in your hat. For he does just as he pleases, gets us mated up somehow; and he sways us like the breezes with his arrows and his bow. Now, he nails some mortals early and he hooks some others late; but he'll catch you when you're napping if your name is on his slate. You may think it soft to dodge him and decline his aid with thanks; you may feel securely anchored in the free, unmarried ranks. But he'll get you if he wants you, and a doughnut to a prune that he'll make you step quite lively to a mushy, spooning tune. Now, of course, some want him badly, but I guess that Cupid thinks that they'd be all right for bracelets, but they'd never do for links. Some folks think they've cheated Cupid, in their lonely singlehood; but it's soup to nuts that Cupid passed 'em by for better wood. Anyway, he's got us guessing, and a jitney to a dime, if the little bantal wants you, that he'll get you in by time.

Opinions

Trend of Elections

The elections of Tuesday show a Republican drift which augures well for 1916. To the discomfiture and annoyance of the Democrats the Republicans introduced the full dinner pail into municipal contests. Let us admit that the tariff bears no relation to a street improvement or to the lid which always figures in local fights. Conceding that what must one think of the holding power of the when it brings triumph in a field where it has no proper part! The Chicago campaign was fought out on the tariff. The Republican candidate for mayor clung to that issue, charging the opposition with responsibility for economic success and promising that the triumph of the old party meant prosperity in 1916. Unfortunately, a religious issue was brought into the campaign. That issue [illegible] cutting both ways. SAND STORMS LOCAL

To the shopkeeper of cleanly instinct the problem of turning a clean face toward the thoroghfare is by no means solved. Pass down First street and turn the corner and march blindly upon Oneida or Cayuga st., and if the passing sand storm has not met you more than half way you may, if you are brave enough, open partly an eye and behold that civilized instinct has forced the shopkeeper to wash his doorstep, polish his window and sweep the floor.

However, the vision of cleanliness is fleeting indeed. Around the corners whirl the little zephyrs and catching the unfettered dirt lying so plentifully upon the pavement whirls and whirls it until it lodges in our hair, upon our hats and neckties; it settles on the meat, the fishes, the fried cakes and the cookies, the clean doorstep and the window. The attempt to make clean is too stupendous a task at present to attempt in our little city, yet we know the city has an abundant water supply.

Progressive cities, little or big, believe cleanliness is a necessity, it pays, it's worth while. Fulton cannot afford to overlook its unclean, yea, dirty streets.

SAVE THE TENEMENT HOUSE LAW

In the history of social legislation in New York State the Tenement House Commission Law was a landmark. It was one of the best things for which Theodore Roosevelt was responsible in his whole public career, and by all means his greatest service to his own state. In the commission which framed the laws sat some of the ablest and most humane of the public spirited citizens of this commonwealth.

From the day the legislation was enacted to the present hour each successive session of the Legislature has seen vicious and determined laws that were the bulwark which had been interposed between the poor, the weak and the defenceless and those who were willing to prosper at the expens of human suffering and make profit from the unsanitary conditions of the poor. In the same measure this legislation protected the fore fortunate by contributing to the reduction of disease resulting from foul conditions in the slums, but in the crowded city transmitted from one section to another.

The assault which is now being made upon the Tenement House Law at Albany, with every present promise of success, is one more striking evidence of the complete disregard at the State Capitol for elemental decency when the question of the comfort and health of the poorer citizens of the state is at stake. A legislature cheerfully prepared to condemn women to twelve hours of work daily six days a week in a canning factory, for which the wage is 10 cents an hour, could hardly be expected to be deeply moved by protests made by the Mayor and the officials of the New York [illegible] on behalf of other women and children hardly more defenceless.

But once more it is necessary to utter a word of warning to Republican legislators and Republican leaders—in this case supported by the Democratic contingent with few exceptions. The punishment for the program they have apparently undertaken is inescapable and not to be too long delayed. Ten years ago another generation of Albany statesmen, another set of Republican leaders, fancied that the chief and noblest aim of those receiving a commission from the people was to serve the public service corporations, and the state was treated to those scandals which remain a landmark of shame in state history.

In that day measures to give away franchises, to permit street railway corporations to refuse transfers, to give perpetual rights without decent protection or proper remuneration for the public, fairly choked the calendars in the Legislature and filled the press with the rumors and reports of scandal, which were thoroughly proven in the insurance investigation and the Allds trial.

The thing that is being done in Albany today is a shade meaner, a degree more contemptible, than the old betrayal of public interest. It is the health, the conditions of life and work of women and children, of men who perform the hardest tasks in the community, which are affected by the bills pending or passed at Albany. Of old it was the pocket of the poor man that invited the legislator to eager activity. But such measures as the cannery bill, the tenement house bill, the Health Department proposal—these strike not at the earnings but at the existence of those for whom laws are supposed to be a protection and legislators the champions.

What profit to their party, to their own prestige, the Republican legislators and leaders can see in the program they are ruthlessly driving through the Legislature this year, The Tribune cannot imagine. But it recognizes and these legislators and leaders must also recognize that already there are thousands of men in this state who are frankly saying to themselves, to their associates, either that the things which Republicans are doing at Albany in 1915 are not Republican, represent a betrayal not an expression, of Republican principles, or that they can see no place for themselves in the Republican party.—New York Tribune.

New Naval Reserves

[illegible] the Naval Reserve established by the late Congress, should, in the number and character of its prospective units, inspire the patriotic hope that the country may soon have at its disposal that second line of defence so much needed and as yet non-existent. Every year thousands of fine men are honorably discharged from the service owing to the expiration of their enlistments. Some of these return to the colors within the statutory period, but the majority is scattered [illegible] the service desire and intend to remain for continuous periods of sixteen or twenty years the advantages of the Naval Reserve are very great. For the recruit entering early this length of service is reached at an age averaging between thirty-five and forty and by joining the reserve on retirement he receives a settled pay that exceeds the normal pension and enjoys special opportunities for fixed and honorable employment in civil life.—New York Herad.

Her Account Of Herself

By ESTHER VANDEVEER

My Dear—I have received your letter, and it has recalled many incidents concerning our childish friendship. Ten years have passed since we were last together—ten years that have made a great change in both of us. You, being a year older than I, must now be twenty-one. You ask me to give an account of myself during our separation, and I will proceed to do so.

Papa died three years ago, and since mamma left us some years before his demise I was left an orphan at seventeen. Papa had made a will when I was twelve, appointing an old chum of his, Charles Edwards, my guardian and directing that I be taken care of by Mr. Edwards till I should come of age. When papa died his attorneys sent a copy of the will to my guardian, who directed that I be sent to him.

What do you suppose I found on my arrival? The housekeeper received me, and when she saw me I thought she would have a fit. It seems that, my father's directions having been laid down in his will when I was ten years old, it was supposed that I was a child. Papa and Mr. Edwards' had lived apart and had not seen each other for ten years. The housekeeper told me that I must wait till she made different arrangements regarding my room, but I was very tired after my journey and insisted on going to it at once.

I was never more amused in my life when I entered the chamber that had been prepared for me. A crib had been procured for me, and the room was strewn with playthings, including dolls. All these things had been bought new, for Mr. Edwards, being a bachelor, had never had any family. I consented to go into another room temporarily, where I rested till dinner time.

I went downstairs at 6 o'clock and found Mr. Edwards had returned from business. He had been told by Mrs. Harding, the housekeeper, that I was much older than he supposed, but even with this he seemed much surprised, though really the surprise was with me. I always looked upon papa as an elderly if not an old man and supposed his friend to be the same. Papa was forty-six when he died, and Mr. Edwards was seven years younger. He doesn't look much over thirty and is as young in his actions as in appearance. We dined together, and he was very good and sympathetic and said so many nice things about papa, regretting that, living in different places, they had been separated. In the evening I overheard him talking with the housekeeper about me and asking her opinion as to whether it would be proper for him to keep me with him. She said that so long as she was in the house it would not be amiss, and he said that since his guardianship would last only a year—till I was eighteen—perhaps I had better remain where I was.

This settled it, and I was sent to school, Mrs. Harding, a woman of sixty, being given full charge of me. I found her an excellent woman and owe a great deal to her care and training.

When I came of age my guardian called me into his study and gave me a talk, telling me that I was now free to act for myself and go where I liked. I asked him where I should go, at the same time wiping the moisture from my eyes. With this he lost his stiffness and told me that I might remain where I was so long as I liked, but that I was now a young lady and must see something of society.

Mr. Edwards had a great many friends and interested several of them to get me invitations, but I had no one to escort me to functions. I wanted him to do so, but he wouldn't. He didn't tell me why, but I knew. He feared people would accuse him of appropriating me to himself. He knew some young fellows at his club and invited them to the house. This I construed to mean that I was to have an opportunity to select a husband from them.

But I [illegible]

All this [illegible] to be [illegible] I have been [illegible] I [illegible] and all [illegible] make a [illegible] coffee."

I [illegible] "I'm just [illegible] are young and at the [illegible] age, I [illegible] I asked, "when the man I wish to marry doesn't wish to marry me?"

At this he started and asked if I had [illegible] upon [illegible] my heart. I told him that I didn't like to answer such a question and that I was perfectly satisfied to remain where I was and would not be driven out. He looked at me strangely at this and ended the interview by turning to his newspaper.

I think Mrs. Harding must have said something to him, for one day he said to me, "Laura, if you propose to make this house your home for life you'll have to marry the old fellow who owns it."

We were married the following June. I am very happy. Now that I have given you an account of myself I shall expect you to do the same by me.

A SLOGAN

By I. E. Hyde

A slogan—a slogan is asked for;
And what is a slogan, pray?
Oh, tell me; will it show us the sunshine,
Or the darksome clouds of a day?
Say; is it a theme for a worker
To sing, when he's out of a job?
Or is it a song for the landlord
To hum, when his tenants he'd rob?
Pray; is it a lyric for financiers
Who run their plants day and night,
Who defy the laws of our labor,
And drain drops of blood with their might?
A slogan—I could not define it,
My encyclopedia failed to show;
But, I think, a slogan, means boosting
On clean grounds, and not moving slow.
A slogan for Fulton—I have it—
"Eureka!"—I cry loud and clear.
We'all all join hands 'round the May-pole,
And each wish the other good cheer.
Good cheer to you, brothers and sisters,
Good cheer to you, rich man and poor;
Good cheer to the stranger in passing;
Good cheer—Fulton opens her door.

French Ambassador Dean of the Diplomatic Corps

Greater attention has never been centered on the diplomatic corps than at the present time at Washington, the capital city of one of the great world powers, is unusually interesting today on that account. Diplomats of the old world such as have stood the test of service at other posts, now appear at the capital of the United States to present diplomatic credentials.

Many persons can remember when there were not so many ambassadors accredited to this country as at present and when this country sent but few ambassadors abroad. Formerly, other countries sent ministers to Washington while this country sent ministers to them. It was not until comparatively recent times that this nation rose to the ambassadorial ranks.

The diplomats at Washington are numerous and as a whole a very interesting body. One can go to a Siamese house, then across the street to a French house, and from a Russian to a Persian house, every legislation and embassy is, in a large measure, typical of the home country which its occupants represent.

The diplomatic corps at Washington is a select organization and is governed by unwritten though well understood rules and regulations. Length of service is the mark of rank in the corps. J. J. Jusserand, the Ambassador of France, is the dean of the diplomatic corps at Washington. He has been in continuous service as the representative of his nation here since February 7, 1903. Next in rank to him is Count J. H. von Bernsstorff, the German Ambassador, who was sent to the United States in 1908. Then followed Domicio da Gama, the Brazilian Ambassador, 1911; George Bakhmeteff, the Russian mbassador, 1911; Viscount Sutemi Chinda, the Japanese Ambassador; 1912; and Constantin Theodor Dumba, the Austrian Ambassador; Sir Cecil Arthur Spring-Riec, the British Ambassador; Senor Don Juan Rianoy Gayangos, the Spanish Ambassador, 1913.

A. Rusten Bey, the Turkish Ambassador; Count V. Macchi di Cellere, the Italian Ambassador; Senor Don Eduardo Suarez-Mujica, the Chilean Ambassador, and Romulo S. Naon, the Argentine Ambassador, all were accredited to Washington during 1914.

Of the Ministers, or as they are officially styled, the Envoys Extraordinary and Ministers Plenipotentiary, Viscount de Alte of Portugal is the oldest in service at Washington. His service began [illegible] while [illegible] of the corps were [illegible] Ambassadorships, his term antedates M. Jusserand's by one year.

The last on the list of Ministers is Carlos A. Meza, Charge d'Affaires and interim of the Legation at Salvador. His service began [illegible]

The [illegible] is referred to the various titles [illegible] by diplomats at Washington. While Count von [illegible] the German Ambassador, is Prince in Bavaria, Prince Bertrand de [illegible] Minister of Embassy, the princess also [illegible] the [illegible] M. Bakhmeteff, the Russian Ambassador, has the high sounding title of "Master of the Imperial Court." M. Scherbatskoy, Counselor of the Russian Embassy, the title of "Chamberlain to His Majjesty the Emperor of Russia" and Joseph Loris-Melikoff also is a "Chamberlain to the Czar" while H. de Mach, Second Secretary of the Embassy, is a "Gentleman in Waiting to the Emperor of Russia."

Dr. Dumba, the Austrian Ambassador is a Privy Councilor of the Austrian Empire. He has as assistants Baron Erich Zwiedinek von Sudonhorst; Stephen Hedry de Hedrie et de Genere Aba, "Chamberlain to His Imperial and Royal Apostlolic Majesty, the Austrian Emperor." Princes and counts also are attached to the Embassy.

Of the 41 Ambassadors and Ministers at Washington but six of them bear titles of nobility. It is noteworthy that the diplomatic attaches holding the most important positions are just plain misters or doctors while the princes or counts are further down the list.

THE STORMING OF STONY POINT

By Sands D. Gardner

My ancestors came from sturdy New England stock, being typical Yankees from way down East. It has been said that you may put a Yankee on a desolate island in the Pacific and leave him with a jackknife, and he will get home as soon, or sooner than the ship that left him there. Put him in anywhere and he will get out if he wants to. This is the spirit that guarantees success in every calling and profession. Men mourn over difficulties, but the earnest, manly spirit looks upon them as opportunities for distinction. There is no obstacle that may not be converted into a stepping stone to success by an heroic spirit.

Benjamin Merchant, my mother's father, was born February 2, 1769, in Reading, Fairfield county, Connecticut. Her mother, Sarah Bradley Merchant, was born October 19, 1798, in Washington, Fairfied county, Connecticut. They had two sons and two doughters. Grandmother outlived her husband but died in a few years, as her family supposed, but it proved to be only a trance, coming to life while preparations were being made for her funeral, and lived a number of years afterwards.

There is something romantic and inspiring about "Old Colonial Days," and I love to read and think about them and of the Colonists' intense struggle for freedom. At different times I have seen considerable of the scenry along the Hudson river which is interesting, romantic and historical and identified with many scenes of the Revolution. Washington Irving has also immorlatized his name and the Hudson river by his sketches. His story of Rip Van Winkle dramatized became famous. George W. Carner, of Fulton, had an uncle, a distinguished actor, who could give a fine representation of that character.

Thomas B. Jones, 46 Illinois, Dazey, N. D., wrote to the National Tribune that while on his farm in North Dakota he fell in with one Eugene Van Winkle, a relative of the Rip Van Winkle of the Washington Irving's story. Mr. Van Winkle, who is now sixty-one years old, is a man of intelligence and well posted on public affairs. His granduncle' the famous "Rip", was editor of a paper and was accustomed to sleep in his arm chair after dinner and smoke his Holland pipe. He was a fast friend of Washington Irving, who told him he was going to publish a story about him. Mr. Van Winkle says if any one wants his autograph he will willingly supply him with the same if he will send self-addressed envelop to him—Eugene R. Van Winkle, Route 1, Dazey, N. D.

Among the many exploits of gallantry and prowess which shed a lustre on the fame of our Revolutionary army, the storming of Stony Point has been considered one of the most brilliant. I visited my mother's oldest brother, my uncle, Bradley Merchant, of De-Ruyter, Madison county, February, 1856, and he informed me that my great-grandfather Merchant on my mother's side was one of the forlorn hope at the storming of Stony Point on the Hudson on the night of July 15, 1779, at twelve o'clock. My uncle said he was a natural born athlete and, as he expressed it, could spring up and knock a man down with his big toe. I remember hearing a circumstance related that occurred one night at a public dance at the hotel in Lysander. I think just before the Civil war. It was said a general row occurred in the ballroom and that a young man took a hand in it that would step up in front of his atagonist, spring up and plant both feet on his breast and knock him down.

To General (Mad Anthony) Wayne, who commanded the light infantry of the army, the execution of the plan was intrusted. Secrecy was deemed so much more essential to success than numbers that it was thought inadvisable to add to the force already on the lines. Stony Point is a commanding hill projecting far into the Hudson which washes three-fourths of its base, the remaining fourth is, in a great measure, covered by a deep marsh, commencing near the river on the upper side and continuing it below. Over this marsh there is only one crossing place. On the summit of this hill was erected the fort, which was furnished with a sufficient number of heavy pieces of ordnance, several breastwork and strong battries were advanced in front of the principal works, and about halfway down the hill were two rows of abbattis. The batteries were calculated to command the beach and the crossing place of the marsh and to rake and enfillade any column which might be advancing from either of those points towards the foot. In addition to the defences several vessels of war were stationed in the river so as to a considerable degree, to command the ground at the foot of the hill. The fort was garrisoned by about six hundred men under Lieutenant-Colonel Johnson. At half-past eleven the two columns moved on to the charge, the van of each with unloaded muskets and fixed bayonets. They were each preceded by a forlorn hope of twenty men. One commanded by Lieutenant Gibbon and the other by Lieutenant Knox, whose duty it was to remove the abbattis and other obstructions in order to open a passage for the columns which followed close in the rear. Out of Lieutenant Gibbon's party of twenty men, seventeen were either killed or wounded. Proper measures having been taken on the route to secure every individual on the route who could give intelligence of their approach, the Americans reached the marsh undiscovered. By unexpected difficulties having been experienced in surmounting this and other obstructions in the way, the assault did not begin until twenty minutes after twelve, then both columns rushed forward, under a tremendous fire of musketry and grape-shot, surmounting every obstacle, they entered the works at the point of the bayonet, without having discharged a single piece, obtaining complete possession of the fort. The humanity displayed by the conquerers was not less conspicous nor less honorable than their courage. Not a single individual suffered after the resistance ceased. At noon of the day preceding the night of the attack the light infantry commenced their march from Sandy Beach, a distance of fourteen miles from Stony Point and passing through an excessive rough and mountainous country, arriving about eight in the afternoon at Spring Steeles, one and a half miles from the fort where the disposition of the assault was made. It was intended to attack the works on the right and left flanks at the same instant. The regiment of Febiger and of Meigs with Major Hull's detachment formed the right column, and Butler's regiment with two companies under Major Murfree formed the left. One hundred and fifty volunteers, led by Lieutenant Colonel Henry and Major Posey, constituted the right, and one hundred volunteers under Major Stewart, composed the van on the left. Proper measures having been taken to secure every individual on the route who could give intelligence of their approach, the Americans reached the marsh undiscovered. All the troops engaged in this perilous task showed great bravery. Colonel Fleury was the first to enter the fort and strike the British standard. Major Posey mounted the works almost at the same instant, and was the first to give the watchword—"The Forts Are Our Own." The returns made by Lieutenant Johnson represnted their dead at only twenty, including one captain, and their wounded as six officers and sixty-eight privates. The return made by General Wayne states their dead sixty, including two officers. This difference may be accounted for by supposing that among those Colonel Johnson supposed to be missing there were many killed. The prisoners amounted to five hundred and forty-three, among whom were one lieutenant-colonel, four captains and twenty subaltern officers. The military stores taken in the fort were also considerable. General Wayne, who marched at the head of Fabiger's regiment in the right column, received a slight wound in the head, which stunned him for a time, but did not compel him to leave the column. Being supported by his aides he entered the fort with the regiment. Lieutenant-Colonel Hay was also among the wounded. The interpidity joined with humanity, its noble companion, displayed on that occasion by General Wayne and his followers cannot be too highly esteemed and commemorated. The most rigid discipline had been enforced and orders to shoot any man that flinched from doing his duty—and the General promised large cash prizes for different acts of valor.

Immediately after the surrender of Stony Point General Wayne transmitted to the Commander-in-Chief the following laconic letter:

Stony Point, July 16, 1779.

Dear General:

The fort and garrison with Colonel Johnson are ours. Our officers and men behaved like men determined to be free.

Yours sincerely,

ANTHONY WAYNE.

Among the historical post cards sent us by our friends, Mr. and Mrs. Tilden Gifford, of Pomona, was one descriptive of Stony Point Park, with its beautiful walks, drives and fancy evergreen trees, which have been laid out on the site of the fort where the memorable engagement took place on the night of the 15th of July, 1779, at 12 20 o'clock as I have stated which was 135 years ago. The biography of the Generals of the Revolution which is very interesting, from which I copied the above account of the assault of Stony Point is eighty-eight years old.

My daughter has desired to join the Daughters of American Revolution, but has been unable to do so, as they are very strict as to all the details, as we do not know the given name of our ancestor. It seems to be a desirable and popular organization.

Superintendent Miller's —Conference Report

Dear Fathers and Brethren—The year has been full of gracious tokens of the Divine favor. A large body of consecrated ministers and devoted people have given themselves unsparingly to the greatest work God ever committed to men.

As an indication of its progress, the Commission on Finance say that last year the reports from Ontario district show a gain in disciplinary benevolences over 1912 of $1,224; in full members a gain of 728; in net property a gain of $82.18; and in ministerial support a gain of $2,461. Notwithstanding the financial stress, we this year will report gains in all these departments of our work.

Advises Marriage

There have been some changes in the personnel of the district. In October, Randall W. Conklin was released from Cleveland that he might finish his course at Drew. Charles A. Miller was appointed to Cleveland. John P. Klotzbach was appointed to Florence soon after conference. In May last Charles L. Peck, pastor of First church, Fulton, was suddenly stricken with serious illness, taking him from the active work. He has borne his affliction heroically. We all rejoice in the preservation of a valuable life and the prospect of his full recovery. The First church has tenderly cared for its pastor through the year. Geoge E. Stockwell was engaged to supply the wok, which he has done in his usual masterful manner, and the reports present a fine record. Samuel H. Stokes, of the Westmoreland charge, has recently undergone an operation for appendicitis. He is fully recovering, for which we all give thanks. When in the middle of the year, Morris S. Scriber was released from North Mexico to engage in evangelistic work, David W. McVeigh was appointed to succeed him.

On the last Sunday in November Mrs. Delos C. Haven, wife of our pastor at Steuben, was suddenly translated to the heavenly home. She was a good and useful woman, and beloved by the people. Our brother has our prayerful sympathy.

There has been an addition to the good realness of our parsonage homes. George Dermott is receiving congratulations on doubling his efficiency by securing such an experienced and valuable helpmeet. To others equally needy we are insistently saying, Go thou and do likewise.

We have had several fine district meetings. The camp meeting at Dempster Grove was inspiring. In connection with it the Epworth League of the district, under the leadership of the President, Spencer B. Owens, held a four-day institute. So successful was it that the District Convention voted to hold another this year. Already we are assured of the presence of General Secretary Sheidan and Dr. Peritz, of Syracuse University. We extend a cordial invitation to the other districts of the Conference to unite with us this year in the institute, and make it a Conference event. We are better prepared than ever to care for such a gathering, for we now have a fine dormitory, built largely by the preachers of the district.

Two sessions of the District Conference have been held. At the March session it was a benediction to have with us Bishop Hamilton, whose stirring addresses greatly helped our men and our church in the community. We closed in a uaming altar service, with a penitent in the midst.

The District League is nourishing. We have had another successful convention, with much enthusiasm. In the closing consecration service four young men gave themselves to the ministry, and four young women to some form of missionary work. The League has paid its first installment of $50 on the Burt Central building at Rome, Italy. We now have 1,677 junior and 583 junior members.

This year ten charges have made advances in pastoral support as follows: New Haven, $50; Fernwood, $25; Florence, $100; Hannibal, $200; Minetto, $100; Cleveland, $50; Central Square, $100; Westdale, $50; Williamstown, $50; Mexico, $160; a total increase of $887.

A Good Year

Our church membership shows a steady growth, and we report an encouraging increase th[illegible]. Beginning the year with 8,730 full members, 26 charges have gained 404 members; 17 charges have lost 237 members; 3 have remained stationary; making a net gain of 167 full members. Our present membership is: Probationers, 856; full members, 8,897; non-resident members, 555; total, 10,306. During the year 124 members have died.

Field Secretary Greenfield, of the Permanent Fund, has had a warm welcome in the churches of the district. We are expecting that under his leadership we will reach the goal of $400,000 and Ontario District is to do its share. Last year, of the thirty-five effective men on the district, 29 contributed and 6 did not; of the 11 supplies, 8 ontributed and 3 did not. Three retired men and two of the unattached men also contributed. This year the churches report 905, and the pastors 306.

There has been a deepening of the spiritual life of our churches. This is seen in the large share revival work has had in the activities of the district. It has been especially marked at thirty-seven places on twenty-five charges. Good help has come to us from outside the district, and we have been developing evangelistic pastors of rare ability. The old-time converting power abides in the church. We are rejoiced to report this year, 1,113 conversions.

Conscientious effort has been made to present to our people the needs of our great benevolences. Under our efficient missionary secretary, Frederick Maunder, we have had several group meetings, at which the inspiring addresses of Dr. E. B. Caldwell helped up materially. We wil report for foreign missions: From the churches $2,938; from the Sunday schools, $778; special gifts, $827; total, $4,543; an increase of $900. For home missions: From the churches, $2,057; from the Sunday schools, $751; special gifts, $33; total, $2,835; an increase of $184. Conference home missions, $554; Woman's Foreign Missionary Society, $2,515; Women's Home Missionary Society, $1,966; gand total for missions, $12,416. We hape raised for Conference claimants, $1,208.

We have raised our first installment of $250 on the Burt Central building, in Rome, Italy, including the District League installment of $50

Through the untiring efforts of the Ladies' Aid Societies, $10,974 has been raised this year, to the encouragement of the men and the improvement of manf repartments of our work.

Praise for Women

We are particularly fortunate in our Sunday school work. Each year has shown an increase in membership. We have a great host enrolled — at present 1,228, including all departments, which is an increase of eighty-three oven last year. Emphasizing the importance of habitual church attendance by the children, we have made an effort this year to secure 75 per cent, of the Sunday school attendance at the preaching service. Of our 94 schools, 8 are suspended. Of the 86 active schools 10 have not reported. Of the 76 reporting schools, 7 have 100 per cent.; 35 have between 75 and 100 per cent.; 12 have 75 per cent.; and 22 are under 75 per cent. We are in this way seeking to save the children to the church.

SEREMET FAILED TO RESPOND

Claims He Has No Money to Mend Wounded Feelings and Reimburse the Young Woman

Casmeric Seremet of the West Side was held before City Judge Wilson this morning on a charge of contempt, he having failed to answer a summons of the court to appear for examination in a supplementary proceedings in bankruptcy.

Seremet was adjudged a bankrupt some time ago. The judment creditor is Miss Catherine Swecz, a sister of Seremet's deceased wife. After Mrs. Seemet's death, Miss Swecz cameto the Seremet home and assumed the duties of housekeeper. A verbal arrangement promising marriage was made between Seremet and the girl. After she had spent some months at his home, he left her abruptly and went to Massachusetts where he married another woman. Before going he borrowed the sum of $100 from Miss Swecz. After he returned with his new mate, she asked him for the return of the money and he refused to give it to her. He then drew $750 from a local bank and disposed of it in some unknown manner just before Miss Swecz brought an action against him.

Before Referee H. L. Gilman attempts have been made to disclose the whereabouts of this money but Seremet has reiterated that he has no money. On the last date set for examination he failed to appear and his attorney, F. G. Spencer offered a defense this morning that his client could not understand the order. Judge Wilson took this into consideration and fined the man $5.

SCOUT NEWS

Troop 1 Shows a Lot of Activity—Entertainment Promised

The thoughts of all Scouts are centering upon the rally to be held at the First Methodist church on Sunday evening. The Scouts will meet at the Baptist church at 7 o'clock and go in a body to the Methodist church. Mr. Boardman knows how to reach the heart of a boy and we know he will give us a fine talk.

Troop 1 will hold its next regular meeting on Tuesday evening, April 12, at 7.30 in the usual place.

At a meeting of the Patrol Leaders and officers on Wednesday evening several matters were discussed, among them was the plan for a Methodist boys' athletic club.

Several sites for a gymnasium are under discussion. We are going to have an entertainment late in April, combining with the Camp Fire Girls. Our mobilization plan is now ready and will be presented to the Troop at the next meeting.

A new merit system will be adopted at the next meeting. It is very important that every scout attends this meeting, and learns about this plan.

A SCOUT.

TWO WAYS OF SECURING TRADE

There are two ways, Mister Merchant, of increasing your trade.

1—By taking business away from your competitor.

2—By creating more business than now exists.

The first of these ways is obviously destructive. The second is constructive. It is always better to build up than it is to tear down.

There are, moreover, two ways in which more business may be created without injuring competitors.

1—By growth of population.

2—By increasing the individual's purchasing power.

A city worth living in will attract more population. A low death rate, enabling its present inhabitants to live longer and more of its children to reach maturity, adds to the population.

Good health, ambition, efficiency, all mean greater producing power, and greater producing power means greatest purchasing power. A man making thirty dollars a week has twice as much to spend as a man making fifteen dollars a week. As a mere business proposition, therefore, it pays a city to provide proper sanitary and housing conditions, good schools and adequate facilities for healthful recreation.

A strong factor in producing this very fundamental prosperity is a well organized and properly financed Chamber of Commerce, whose officers are imbued with a high degree of civic spirit.

Geo. W. Caldwell

George W. Caldwell, father of Mrs. E. J. Penfield, died Easter morning, April 4th, in Indianapolis, Ind., at the age of 72 years. He enlisted in the war of '61, serving through the entire war under Col. Harrison and was a body guard to President Harrison at his inauguration. He was mustered out under President Lincoln. He was related to Gen. Lew Wallace on his mother's side and to James Whitcomb Riley on his father's side.

Mr. Caldwell was a law student and the possessor of a library of rare and costly books. He had visited his daughter, Mrs. Penfield, in this city, a number of times, spending the winter here two years ago. He had been in failing health for four years and died in Danville, Ill., at the home of his daughter, Mrs. Scott Page.

FIRST OUTDOOR WORK OF YEAR

Candidates Represent Good Material, But Show Little Evidence of Enough Ambition

The Futon High school baseball squad held its first and real work out of the season yesterday afternoon. The practise was featured by much horseplay and little real work and the prospects of the team are anything but bright unless some radical changes are made at once.

* * *

About fifteen men appeared for the drill and the majority of them were in street clothes and accordingly could not get down to business. For a school the size of Fulton's the turnout was anything but representative, and some measures should be taken at one to get new men out for the team. Players abound in the school—it is true that some of the men have had no great experience, but constant practice will soon fit a novice for a steady berth on the team.

* * *

'Brien and Pullen were the only two men at work yesterday in the pitching department. Pullen lacks control although he has a world of speed, and it was self efident that he would be more successful in some other position. The squad showed no especially promising candidates for first base, and if Pullen can be induced to go out for the initial sack that side of the infield will be well taken care of.

* * *

Lewis, a diminitive lad, shows all the earmarks of a comer. He played third base for a short time yesterray afternoon and handled himself well—his thows are snappy and fast and, at present, his only difficulty seems to be at the bat.

* * *

There are some of the squad who are badly affected with the "big head" as is the case in every high school squad in the country. These fellows will have to learn to control their tempers and get down to work for the good of the team, or their presence on the squad will work for harm.

AMATEUR NIGHT PLEASED CROWD

Strong Man Mott Wanted to Lift a Building, Pool Tables and All

Vaudeville, staged by amateurs from this city, was the attraction that filled the house at The Quirk last night. After a particularly good photo play in which Francis X. Bushman, considered the most popular photo play actor in America, starred, Manager Darleigh announced the program next week and the names of the amateurs.

The first number introduced Miss Martha Wright, a diminutive miss of 13 summers, who appeared in Scotch costume. She sang "Annie Laurie" and "Comin' Thro the Rye" and then executed the Highland fling with a grace and precision that brought down the house.

Henry Mott, Fulton's "Hercules," was the next entertainer. Henry demonstrated his enormous strength by lifting four 50-pound weights with his neck. Henry also offered to lift MacIntosh's pool room if they would be kind enough to bring it around. A small boy who was visibly nervous seated himself in a chair and allowed Mott to lift the chair with his teeth. On the first attempt Mott lost his hold and the boy narrowly escaped a spill.

VanBuren and Wicks, both of this city, appeared in a piano sketch. The act was a little drawn out but had merit. VanBuren sang "On the 3.15" with considerable spirit and Wicks furnished a novel piano accompaniment. It was rumored after the show that a New York vaudeville agent had conferred with the young men in regard to an engagement on the Loew circuit.

Mike Gresnahan, the boy baritone, was the last number on the card. Aside from the fact the music was pitched a little low for Mike in places, his act went over in good shape. He rendered "When I Dream of Old Erin" and "Mother Machree" with much feeling.

There was no award of prizes, all of the artists appearing on a salary basis. Manager Darleigh has planned another amateur night for next Friday.

ALBANY LETTER DAY BY DAY

Cardoze Tells Times Readers the Doings of Officials and Lawmakers

By Frederic T. Cardoze

Albany, April 10.—Now that the minds of automobilists are turning to the condition of the good roads, data concerning the apportionment of State funds for the construction of highways in New York State should be of interest.

In his last report in book form, about to be made public, John H. Delaney, as State Commissioner of efficiency and economy, has considerable to say concerning the growth and inception of the good roads system.

State highways in this State were made possible under a bill passed by the legislature in 1898, known as the Higby-Armstrong at. It provided that the important highways of the State shoud be constructed under the direction of the State engineer and surveyor and that the cost of a given highway should be borne bf the borne by the State, county and town in which the given highway was located. It was provided that the State pay fifty per cent. of the cost, the county thirty-five and the town fifteen per cent.

From 1898 to 1905 inclusive, a total of $3,223,265 was appropriated by the State for the construction of main highways under the Higby-Armstrong act.

As a result of the action of the legislature in 1906, the board of supervisors of each county submitted to the State engineer and surveyor a system of main highways. These systems, after having been revised by the State engineer and surveyor, were submitted to the legislature in 1907 and after being amended were adopted.

In 1909 an amendment to the Highway law provided for the construction of State and county highways, the entire cost of the former being met by the State while the cost of the laste was divided between the State, county and town on the basis outlined in the Higby-Armstrong act. Thirty-two hundred miles of State highwafs were established at this time and later about six hundred miles were added by the legislature.

In 1905 the people of the State aprooued the rst issue of $50,000,000 of highway bonds, which, by the constitutional amendment pertaining thereto, must ge used for the construction of highways equitly apportioned among the counties. In 1912 the people approved the second issue of bonds amounting to $50,000,000. The legislature provided that $20,000,000 was to be used for the construction of State highways and $30,000,000 for the construction of county highways. It further provided that the above amounts should be apportioned among the several counties upon the following basis: One-third in proportion to the population; one-third in propotion to the mileage of highways outsie of cities and incoporated villages and one-third in proportion to area.

In the opinion of Mr. Delaney that since the cost of consstruction of State highways is borne entirely by the State and that these highways were thus designated because they would be of value to the State as a whole, it is apparent that the county as a unit should not be considered in connection with this class of highways.

"It is further evident," says Mr. Delaney in his report, "that the area, population and total mileage of highways in a given conntf has but very little bearing upon the cost per mile of [illegible] highways along the border, and in many cases but slight connection with the mileage of interstate and interstate trunk highways which have been laid out by the legislature."

Mr. Delaney recommends that at the Constitutional Convention the Highway law be amended.

Helde denied the charge.

SIMPLE SPELLING MOVE TO PAUSE

New York, April 10.—The Simplified Spelling Board held its annual meeting at the Waldorf on Tuesday and Wednesday without telling any one about it. Yesterday the office manager, Henry Gallop Paine, issued a summary of results, and announced that the last year had been the most successful in the history of the board.

It was decided to make no further recommendations of changes in spelling hntil those already put forth are more generally used. The twelve words approved by the National Education Association have been adopted by more than twenty newspapers, among which are The Post," of Kansas City; "The Post," "Times" and "Rocky Mountain News," of Denver, and "The Capital" and "Daily News," of Des Moines.

Eighty-six universities, colleges and normal schools have approved the principle of simplified spelling. This is an increase of sixty-five since April, 1914.

At the meeting "Fases and Problems of Field Work" were discussed by the various agents and the office manager. Professor Charles H. Grandgent, of Harvard, was elected president; Heny Holt, secretary, and Gano Dunn, treasurer. The other members of the executive committee are Professor James W. Bright, of Johns Hopkins; Dr. Melvil Dewey, Professor Brander Matthews, of Columbia; Fred J. Miller, Professor Calvin Thomas, of Columbia, and Dr. William Hayes Ward.

About Sports Generally

By Frank G. Menke

Jess Willard is five and one-half inches taller than Jack Johnson in normal condition, but when the pair met on April 5 in the battle for the heavyweight championship of the world Willard stood about eight inches taller than Johnson. This may account in part for Willard's victory.

Johnson crouches. That crouch carries him down at least one and one-half inches, reducing his height to five feet ten inches. Willard fights in an upright position, taking full advantage of his six feet six inches.

Johnson never had gone up against a man anywhere near the size of Willard. Johnson fought most of his battles against little men. Tommy Burns, Frank Moran and Jim Flynn were all smaller than the negro. Jeffries was a bit taller, but the dicerence in size was hardly noticeable. But with Willard towering eight inches above him, Johnson found himself confronting a situation that was new in the annals of pugilism.

Johnson's main punches are a right to the heart and a right or left uppercut. Willard's height made the solar-plexus punch one that Johnson could deliver without much effort. But it seemed to render the uppercut almost nil.

In fighting against smaller men, or men of his own height, Johnson had to lift the punch for the heart. Against Willard he could shoot it out straight from the shoulder, without losing any force in a swing, and deliver it with even greater force than against men of his own size.

But to reach Willard's jaw was difficult. Johnson had to swing before and the experts figured that before the swing connected with the jaw it had most of its power.

Another thing that was against Johnson was the fact that Willard had a longer reach.

Johnson ever before had failed to turn back the blows that came straight at him or came up at him. But what could he do when blows were showered down on him from Willard's immense height?

Johnson is a master boxer. None can deny that, nor the fact that he is one of the brainiest men that ever donned a mitt. Johnson has met many strange and powerful attacks in the past—and turned them back, because the nimbleness of his brain enabled him to figure out his plan of campaign instantly. This time he failed.

HOT LINERS

While boxing matches of varying degrees of goriness are permitted in this state, it seems like straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel to shut out the Willard-Johnson films.

* * *

The N. L. race this season should verge on a young riot. The Brayes are out to make the hardest fight they know, with the entire camp bristling with aggressiveness.

But they will encounter the bitterest sort of opposition from Giants, Cubs and Cardinals—if not from others—and the best forecast available is that the coming National League fight will be the scrappiest campaign since 1908, when Giants, Cubs and Pirates all finished neck and neck in a wild frenzy, with the fur eight inches deep. After the lethargy of last year the yawning fan can look for more action this season than he or she has observed for quite a spell—for with Stallings, McGraw and Bresnahan in a three-cornered fight—as it looks to be—there will be very little insomnia on the field.

* * *

"I intend to get all the money I can," announces Mr. Willard—who in this respect hasn't anything on 60,000,000 or 80,000,000 of his fellow citizens.

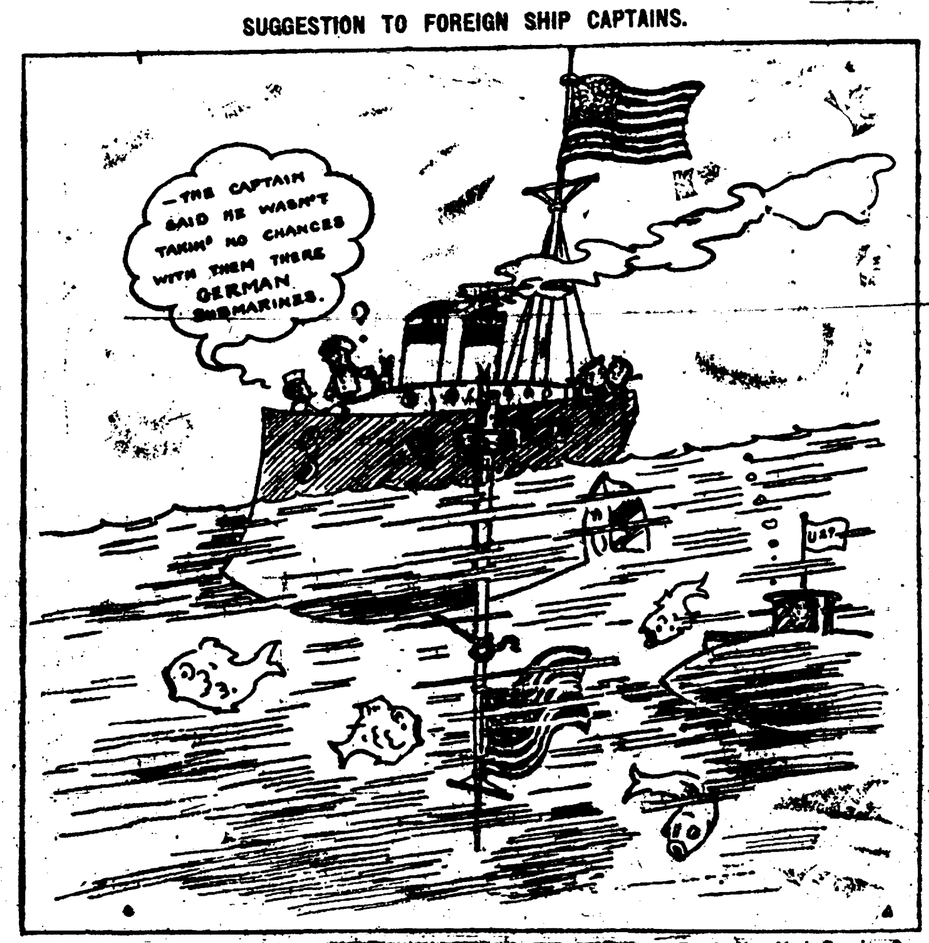
* * *

"Willard's backers refuse $3,000 a week to show the champion"—proving again that while the Pen may have a distinct edge on the Sword, it is a bush league piker compared to the Punch.

* * *

Still, there is this to be said of Willard—in showing him the promoters will display more heavyweight championship flesh than was ever shown before. More by about three inches and some twenty odd pounds.

* * *



Gunboat Smith, one of the two men who ever won on points from Willard, will make his new start toward the championship of the heavyweights next Tuesday night, when he faces Charley Weinert, the Newark light heavyweight, in the main bout at the Broadway Sporting Club, of Brooklyn.

Until he met with the crushing defeat at the hands of Sam Langford, Smith was the leading "white hope" of the world. If he succeeds in putting the quietus on Weinert, he will go after all the other big men in the class, with the idea of forcing the new champion into the ring with him a second time.

* * *

Joe Mandot, the fast New Orleans lightweight, will meet Freddie Welsh, the world's champion, in Memphis, about the middle of May, according to Tommy Walsh, Joe's manager. Mandot is certainly mapping out an ambitious program for himself, as he will take on Johnny Griffith, the sensational Ohio lightweight, in the same ring on May 3.

SUGGESTION TO FOREIGN SHIP CAPTAINS.

—Fox in New York Evening Sun.

DUBLIN LAD, TEN, WOULD BE A COWBOY

Writes to Secretary Garrison Asking For a Place.

Washington.—Secretary of War Garrison is willing and anxious to do a good turn for an ambitious Irish boy in Dublin, who wants to be a cowboy. But the secretary hails from New Jersey and knows neither cowboys nor ranch owners. He would like to receive an offer from any ranchman who is ready to transform this Irish boy into a cowpuncher.

These offers when received at the war department will be forwarded to the Dublin lad in response to a letter sent by him to Mr. Garrison as follows:

Dear Sir—I would be very thankful if you would try and get me into the cowboy ranch. I would like to be a cowboy and I would be very glad if you would do your best and get me into the cowboy ranch. I am a boy of ten years of age. I am five foot, and I would make a fine man, and I would do my best and work hard at the cattle and drive them wherever you want them. I would like to be a cowboy rancher. I am very fond of cowboys. That is why I would like to be one.

Mr. Garrison was puzzled to understand why the boy had written, but is ready to aid him in his ambition. The boy gave his name and address, but these were withheld by the secretary when he made public the letter. It was informally suggested that, if the letter were referred to Colonel Roosevelt the latter would find the ranchman.

ASK REPEAL OF DRUG LAW.

Habitual Dope Fiends Send Pathetic Letters to Revenue Department.

Washington.—Appeals for some relaxation of the rigid anti-drug law are pouring in on the commissioner of internal revenue from unfortunates in all parts of the country.

The sufferers find their sources of supply cut off and are becoming desperate. Pathetic and hysterical applications have been penned. None of the letters are being made public, but it is said that the names of some of the signers of the epistles would startle the communities in which they live.

Naturally the commissioner is powerless to do anything other than enforce the law even if he wished to modify the regulations.

COLLEGE GIRLS DO MARRY.

Bryn Mawr Dean Says More Than 50 Per Cent of Graduates Wed.

Philadelphia.—The popular impression that college women do not like wedlock is refuted by the statement of "Doctor" Isabel Maddison, recording dean of Bryn Mawr college, who says that more than 50 per cent of the school's graduates who left the institution fifteen years ago are now married.

She considers that this average is a fine one, but refuses to comment on the fact that about nine out of every ten women not of college training are married before reaching the thirty mark.

NOVELIST DRIVES AMBULANCE

Henry Sydnor Harrison Learned French and Motoring in Two Months.

Paris.—Henry Sydnor Harrison, the American novelist, has begun his duties as an automobile ambulance driver for the American hospital. His work for the time being will be the transportation of wounded soldiers within Paris, but he hopes to be sent to the front soon.

Mr. Harrison went to London from New York two months ago determined to get into the war in some way. He had an insufficient knowledge of

HENRY SYDNOR HARRISON.

French, so he started a cramming course in that language. At the same time he attended a school for motorcar drivers. Six hours daily were spent learning French from a Belgian refugee and as many more at a school for motorists.

Then Mr. Harrison came to Paris to put the finishing touches on his necessary education and finally received his much desired diploma.

Mr. Harrison is the author of "Queed," "V. V.'s Eyes" and "Angela's Business," just published. He has also written numerous short stories which have appeared in the periodicals. He was born in Sewlinee, Tenn., in 1880.

LEAVES HOUSE TO HER PETS.

Dead Woman's Dogs and Cats Occupy Home That Was Hers.

Elizabeth, N. J.—Occupying a house in Ashwood avenue, a company of dogs and cats, which were the pets of the late Mrs. Mary Romaine Wright, will be allowed to enjoy undisturbed their present abode until they voluntarily seek another home. Such request is contained in the will of Mrs. Wright. Mrs. Wright's daughter, Mrs. Frederick C. Kelley, is named to see that the strange request is carried out.

In accordance with the dead woman's desires her late home is kept heated and the animals fed regularly. Mrs. Kelley said she hoped the animals would become sufficiently attached to her to make their abode at her house, which is only a short distance from the Wright homestead. Mrs. Wright was well known in this vicinity as a friend of dumb animals. With her husband, the late Seaman L. Wright, she lived for more than forty years in the old homestead.

SUPT. MILLER MAKES REPORT

$210, and another gift of $200, the income to be used for pastoral support.

The South Hannibal charge has a gift this year from Mrs. Julia Candee of $300—$100 for foreign missions, $100 for home missions, $50 for the Freedman's Aid Society, and $50 for the Permanent Fund.

A bequest of $428.67 comes to the Board of Foreign Missions from the estate of Charles W. Clinch, of the Vernon charge.

About the last act of a good woman Miss Augusta Brill, of Northwestern, was the gift of $50 each to the Boards of Foreign and Home Missions.

In August a new church was organized at Balcomville, on the Florence charge, with three full members and fourteen probationers. Later, as a result of the revival in September 25 were converted.

Our people have been active in caring for the material interests of the church, and repairs and improvements have been quite extensive. At Clevelan dthe parsonage has been renovated, new carpets placed in the church and other repairs made to the extent of $405. At Altmar a new roof has been put on the church at a cost of $269. The parsonage at Constantia has been repaired and the church decorated, the pulpitp latform rebuilt and new carpets laid, at a cost of $160. At West Monroe, on the same charge, the church has been redecorated and new pews put in at a total cost of $210. Fernwood has expended $90 for concrete platform and walks. The Point Rock church, on the Lee Center charge, has been repaired at a cost of $85; and at Lowell $70 has been so expended. The parsonage at McConnellsville has been painted and put in comfortable condition, at a cost of $85. At North Osceola, n the Redfield charge, it is planned to rebuild the present schoolhouse into a chapel, where the loyal little society will be pleasantly housed. At Scriba a new steel ceiling graces the audience-room. It cost $236. The Lansingchurch has also expended $80, a total of $316. On the Vermillion charge this has been a year of improvements costing $375. The Wellwood church has been presented a fine organ. The church at Clifford has expended $150 in new carpets, decorations and painting the building. At Vermillion the church has a new roof, new carpets, new decorations, and the building will be painted. Vernon has expended $150 in painting the parsonage and improving the building. Repairs to the church at Orwell include new carpets and decorations. With other improvements at Richland, $576 has been expended. Oswego Trinity has expended $631 in improving its property. At Westmoreland the hurch has been repaired and improved to the extent of $572, and at Clark Mills $226 has been expended—a total of $978. At Williamstown $335 has been expended, including a new furnace for the parsonage and other improvements, while at Westdale the church has been painted and other repairs made costing $118. The Camden chapel and vestibule have been thoroughly renovated, and the church and parsonage painted at a cost of $1,000, which has been paid. Pastor and people are justly proud.

Pulaski's Work

The Minetto church, with the assistance of Mr. Carnegie, has just put in and paid for a fine pipe organ, at a cost of $1,700. It greatly adds to the attractiveness of this pleasant church. At Pulaski a church barn has been built to replace the old sheds. It has twenty-one stalls and cost $850. The church has recently bought for $500 the lot adjoining the parsonage, and it is hoped that in the near future a new parsonage may replace the old. Our church at Central Square has been rebuilt, with a new tower, an addition for the choir and pulpit, electric lights, seats remodeled, and new floors and runners. It is now one of the finest of our village churches. The cost was about $2,500, and is all provided for. The energetic young pastor has shown a veteran's skill. Early in the year the Oswego First church made plans for the rebuilding of the church. Under the skillful leadership of the pastor, these plans developed till a new church finally evolved out of the old. Beginning

ELABORATE CREATION.

Frills and Bows Make Taffeta Frock Very Smart.

AFTERNOON GOWN.

Some frocks this season are plain, but we would by no means include in the category the frock pictured in the illustration.

The gown is developed in pale gray taffeta, and the skirt is covered with wide circular flounces held beneath a straight panel at the back. The bodice is of taffeta, with sleeves and collar of white net, finished with stiff frills. The wide girdle ends in a huge bow placed sidewise over the hip.

Domestic Hints.

Never use linen to clean mirrors or windows, as it sheds lint and often causes streaks.

Wash linoleum and oilcloth with lukewarm water, then polish it with a soft woolen cloth which has been dipped in milk.

Use no soap on window glass. Use old muslin and clean, soft water. A cotton cloth dipped in a little alcohol will add brilliancy to the final rub.

If white of egg is applied with a small camelshair paint brush to fly specks on gilt frames, then rubbed gently with a soft cloth the specks will disappear.

When your house plants look a trifle dejected and water does not revive them try putting coffee grounds on the roots three times a week; then once a week give them a tablespoonful of olive oil. Do not allow the earth to become hard and dry.

The Useful Sailor.

Every one is glad that the sailor shape is in evidence in spring millinery. Many hats there are of picture type, poke shapes, too, that are vastly becoming. But for general wear nothing is so smart as the sailor. It will probably be worn a good deal when warmer weather comes.

Ether Removes Grease Stains.

Ether is a very good thing to remove grease stains from woolen apparel. Another method is to wet the garment in tepid water, then place it in cold water to which a little borax has been added. The article should be soaked for several hours and then dried quickly.

WOMEN'S WHIMSIES.

Beaded, jeweled and sequin vests of satin, velvet, net and lace, and shot with gold and silver threads are worn with the bodices of afternoon gowns.

One novelty is to wear [illegible] sizes set in the settings of antique gold or silver or even of iron or brass, strung to form chains made of the same metals.

These summery-looking, net-like evening gowns made of harmoniously colored chiffons, brocaded crepes or satins of a particularly soft quality.

For those who possess lace scarfs, no matter what the simple or ornate quality or type, the season's latest adventure reveals a liking for these frivolous neck or shoulder fixings for wear with the new gowns for dance and evening wear.

Even the fluffs of tulle or maline which have been used all season in clouds of frothy white or in sunset tints of gorgeous colorings have their ends weighted by single metallic threaded tassels or with silk made roses in bouquet forms, each one concealing a silk covered weight to keep it in position.

Points for Mothers

The Mother's Authority.

Obedience that cannot be secured without many repetitions, loud tones or a threatening manner is of little value. A prompt response to a simple request is of great value in securing an obedient habit of mind. For instance, if you say, "Mary, please close the door," Mary may do so immediately without waiting to finish something she may be doing at the same time, or she may dawdle along and wait for a repetition of the order and finally say, "Yes, when I get this done," or something like it. In the child who responds quickly is seen one already on the path to trained and instant obedience, without servility, simply showing the recognition of simple orders, a most valuable point in the education of little children.

In the other a careless habit of mind is noted, a lax recognition of the mother's authority, which should be held always, in gentle ways, and which must be recognized at first, in every way. Abbott says in his "Gentle Measures In the Management of the Young" that there are three ways the mother governs the child—first, by maneuvering and artifice; second, by reason and affection, and, third, by authority. He also says that of the three methods the last is the only one which can be followed either with comfort to the parent or safety to the child, and this method can be brought effectually into operation by gentle measures. It is, indeed, true that the importance of tact and skill in the training of the young and of cultivating their reason and securing their affection cannot be overrated. But the influences secured by these means form at the best but a sandy foundation for filial obedience to rest upon. The foundation must be a gentle but firm authority.

Babies Should Sleep Alone.

From the very dawn of his precious life the baby should sleep alone in his own crib.

From the viewpoint of hygiene it is the only plan, and it is, moreover, the only possible way of insuring comfortable rest for either child or mother.

When the means are lacking at the time of baby's arrival to provide a bona fide crib a very good one may be improvised out of an old fashioned clothes basket, which has the advantage of being easily transported from one room to another.

It should be fitted from top to bottom with a detachable lining of white mull or dotted Swiss shirred over pale blue cambric. The mattress should be quite four inches thick and made to fit the bottom of the basket, and it should be well protected with a rubber sheet.

Over this—not under it—should be smoothly spread the usual white sheet, made preferably from a piece of an old sheet of soft linen, and over this again should come the washable pad of stockinette.

There is no need of an upper sheet, as the baby will be wrapped in a soft, warm blanket before being laid in his snug little nest, nor should a pillow be used, as he will be infinitely better off without one.

The coverlet should be light of weight, but well wadded, with three or four thicknesses of silkoline over the cotton filling. Down fillings should never be used for a baby's pillows or coverlets, as the particles of down, filtering through the covers, will almost certainly find their way into the nostrils and mouth and thence into the lungs and air passages.

The Mother of Today.

Where was the mother of yesterday who understood her boy's game of football, who encouraged him in his athletics and who was as enthusiastic as he along those lines?

Where also could one find twenty years ago the woman who played tennis with her husband, or taught her to golf, coal swim as well as sew and accompanied her to dances, not as a staid chaperon, but as one who enjoyed dancing too?

And yet this type of modern mother exists in hordes today. She is no curiosity, but a reality, who is raising the standard which is equal to the love of children she has lent into the world. And when she has [illegible] made of [illegible] a [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] with a heavy brown sandstone base, the first story rises in the same material, with the upper portion of the building and the tower in red-brown tapestry brick. A massive portal adds impressiveness to the beautiful exterior. Within, is the new social-room below, and above, one of the finest audience-rooms to be found, with rich windows, chaste decorations and artistic lighting. The new building is in perfect harmony with the beautiful chapel, and the whole now constitutes one of the best church properties in the city. The total cost is $15,927, on which there remains an indebtedness of only $4,500. Other pleasant and necessary improvements have been made at Oswego Center, Granby Center, Goodenough, Fulton State street, New Haven, North Bay, New London, Lowell, Verona, Rome First.

These and other expenditures for building, improvements and repairs bring the total up to $59,279.

During the year there has been paid on indebtedness at Fulton First, $1,600; Oswego Trinity, $600; Rome First, $2,300; Oswego First, $900. A total of $5,400. Our present indebtedness is $38,000.

This year we have undertaken the important work of making parish surveys throughout the district. Our territory covers all of Oswego county except Phoenix, a large part of Oneida county, and parts of Jefferson and Lewis. We have three cities with six churches, five large villages with five churches, twenty-eight small villages with twenty-eight churches, twenty-four hamlets with twenty-four churches, and thirty-two distinctly rural churches. We have endeavored to ascertain the number of Methodist adherents, the unattending adherents, the unattending members, the young people outside the church membership, the number of undeposited church letters, and the number of non-contributors among the members and adherents.

In the six city churches we have 3,560 members; 7,637 adherents; 3,765 unattending adherents; 250 unattending members; 551 young people outside church membership; 52 undeposited church letters, and the number of non-contributors among members and adherents.

In the five large villages we have 2,103 members; 2,197 adherents; 1,115 unattending adherents; 94 unattending members; 355 young people outside church membership; 28 undeposited church letters; and 1,276 non-contributors.

In the eighty-three small villages hamlets and rural churches we have 4,643 members; 11,192 adherents; 5,014 unattending adherents; 443 unattending members; 933 young people outside church membership; 73 undeposited church letters, and 3,627 non-contributors.

On the whole district we have 10,306 members; 21,026 adherents; 9,895 unattending adherents; 787 unattending members, 1,839 young people outside church membership, and 7,678 members and adherents not contributing to the support of the church.

All of this information is being indexed for permanent record and use by the pastors and churches. Undoubtedly these figures will be largely increased as we become more familiar with our great field. Only by painstaking pastoral oversight can this work be made perfect. When it is perfected, then will we be ready to meet our responsibility to the great mass of non-churchgoers throughout our territory.

I close this report with profound gratitude to the faithful pastors and earnest people of Ontario district who have done so much to advance "the faith which was once delivered unto the saints."

PERFECT NEW DEVICE FOR TRANSPORTING WOUNDED.

Loading of War Ambulance Done From Side Instead of Rear.

"It is not only the faithful devotion to duty of our surgeons which deserves praise," writes a contributor to the Figaro of Paris, "but recognition should also be made of the intelligence and ingenuity displayed by the officials working, so to speak, on the outskirts of the medical profession—that is, those who are doing all in their power to relieve the sufferings of wounded or ill soldiers.

"One of the questions which have preoccupied the attention of the medical authorities ever since the outbreak of the war has been the removal of the wounded from the fields of battle. It was realized that such removal must be promptly and easily effected and at the same time done in a way to cause the least pain. This problem appears now to have been solved. The superintendent of the military hospital at Versailles has invented a device by which the loading of an ambulance is done from the side instead of from the rear. No more bad shocks or dangerous hitches. The stretcher on which the wounded is lying is put right down on boards projecting horizontally from the side of the vehicle, and with little effort it can be pushed into the car.

"The wounded man is then easily accessible to the surgeon, who only needs to raise the shades on either side of the cot to get at him and examine his injuries without disturbing the other three patients, for whom there is room in the car. After the stretchers have been removed a double folding bench is let down in the middle of the car between the cots. This bench extends through the length of the ambulance, and on it can be seated six to eight slightly wounded soldiers, back to back. The whole arrangement is very practical.

"Vehicles of this kind can be driven at a speed of fifteen to eighteen miles an hour without causing the least inconvenience to the occupants."

"TWO EYES LUXURY," HE SAYS

General Maunoury Philosophical Over the Loss of One of Them.

The Paris Matin gives an eyewitness account of the wounding of General Maunoury and General de Villaret, who were shot while at the front. It follows:

"They were inspecting a trench which had not been fired on for several days, at a moment when perfect calm reigned along both lines. Arriving at a loophole De Villaret regarded the enemy's trench and then, leaning toward his companion, said, 'See how extraordinary it is.'

"Maunoury had just lowered his eye to the level of the peephole when a bullet removed his eye, broke his jaw and struck De Villaret in the middle of the forehead. Maunoury fell to the bottom of the trench immediately, but Villaret, believing he himself had received only a mere clod of earth, remained upright, assisted Maunoury and walked 1,500 yards before he himself fell.

"A scientist who was visiting his friend Maunoury supported him, saying, 'The loss of an eye means the loss of only one twenty-fourth of the sight.' When Maunoury heard this he murmured, 'If that is so two eyes seem almost a luxury.'"

FIGHT MILITARY FASHIONS.

Women Will Not Use Anything That Has War Glamour.

A fight against the military note in spring fashions for women is planned by the Cleveland Circle of the Woman's Peace Party. Members of the party decline to lend their approval of the European conflict by wearing near military trappings.

"We shall ignore this fashion flurry by wearing our old clothes or waiting until the manufacturers give us what we want," said Mrs. Milton R. Schatz, official mouthpiece of the Cleveland circle.

Mrs. Frank M. Kimball, a member of the advisory council, believes that the acceptance of military modes is due to the glamour of war as reflected in the striking applications of buttons and braid.

Out of Line.

An enlisted man at the post at Fort Leavenworth was ordered to the range for the first time for target drill. Out of twenty-one chances the newcomer made never a hit.

"Oh, you dub!" exclaimed an officer standing near. "You've missed the target every time! What's the matter?"

"Well, sir," answered the recruit nonchalantly, "the only [illegible] I can think of at present is the [illegible] who set up my target base [illegible] in a straight line from here."

"NEVER AGAIN," SAYS YANKEE, EX-SOLDIER

Seven Foot Baltimore Man Tells of Experiences in Trenches.

New York. — "Never again!" This was the whole souled utterance of Rutledge F. Gardner of Baltimore, a seven foot (almost) passenger who went to England in December and enlisted in King Edward's horse and went to France with his regiment. He returned with much experience and a wrist watch. This is his chronicle:

"We were sent to France in February, where we mounted at Calais and rode to Neuve Chapelle. There we spent a lot of time in holes in the ground, shooting at an unseen enemy and being shot at ad lib.

"As I was a pretty big man I was often detailed as a 'creeper.' They're quite an institution in the service now. The duty of the 'creeper' is to sneak toward the German lines at night to locate snipers. The way you locate them is by letting them fire at you. You catch the flash of the rifle, see? Then your side fires at the flashes. It's quite a game, believe me!

"A trench fell in on me, and I was sent back to England and there discharged.

"The Americans fighting with the English are not very popular. They are called Yanks and come in for a lot of spooning. In my regiment there wasn't much future."

Milwaukee Thirty-niners Organize For Goodfellowship.

Madison, Wis. — "To promote the use of the stein, the soothing weed and the story; to induce boisterous laughter and to use such nicknames, terms of affection, handclasps and caresses as will promote good feeling" are some of the purposes of the Society of Thirty-niners, Milwaukee, which has asked permission to incorporate.

Whether this organization can be sanctioned by the state is being considered.

Another aim of the society is "to calm the rising tide of warfare which may be raging in our breasts by smoking the pipe of peace and smilingly watch our troubles float away."

Eight Days for Lawmakers to Pass Last Party Bills
Cannery Bill Hearing by Governor Awaited

Secured Debts, Labor Consolidation and Party Conventions Among Leading Measures to Be Passed

Albany, N. Y., April 12.—There will be just eight more days of the legislative session of 19155. It will resume work at half-past eight o'clock tonight, and unless something unexpected happens, will finish late on April 22. Most of the "big" work of the session has been done. Practically all the changes recommended by the Governor in his speeches and hs messages have been made, but thre are some very vital things yet to come up. Some of them are likely to plunge the two branches into conflict, but there appears no danger of a break between the Governor and republican directors of field work.

It is to be "full-speed ahead" for five days this week and four next. The decks will be cleared, so the appropriation measures may be put through during the closing days.

The important things which are to be disposed of, as far as possible, during the next few days are:

The secured debt bill.

The bill consolidating the Labor and Workmen's Compensation Departments. The amendments to the election law, most interesting of which is the referendum on the re-establishment of State conventions.

The compensation amendments divorcing the State fund from the commission and extending the scope of the law to new occupations.

Repassage of conservation bill, which was misprinted.

Appropriation bills.

Other important events of the week will be:

Hearings Before Governor.

Hearing before the Governor on Tuesday of the bill to impose an annual tax on secured debts.

Hearing before the Governor on Thursday on the bills permitting canning factories to employ women and children seventy-two hours a week.

Dinner of republican lawmakers for Elihu Root on Tuesday night.

There promises to be a lively battle over the labor bills and the Mills bills to squeeze additional revenue out of secured debts. The first are more radical than almost any other measures that have come before the Legislature this year. They would create an industrial commission of five members to have full supervision of the functions of the workmen's compensation commission and the labor department.

Governor Whitman has expressed the belief that before any change is made in the management of the compensation commission the State should wait a year to see how the direct settlement amendments work out. They were enacted this year after a sensational fight.

However, the Republican eleaders say they believe the industrial commission should be established at once, and say they intend to go ahead. They add that they have the votes necessary to pass the bill. Formidable opposition has appeared. It has come from labor interests throughout the State, from friends of James M. Lynch, the Labor Commissioner, and from reformers in some of the large cities, who say they regret to see the Workmen's Compensation commission interfered with in any way.

"I do not see any reason why the bill should not pass," said Senator Spring, author of the bill, tonight. "It will save a lot of money to the State and will certainly not impair the efficiency of either the labor or the compensation department. By getting five men to have charge of the work and by placing John Mitchell, for instance at the head, the State would be much better off than it is at present.

Direct Tax May Be $15,000,000

The Governor's executive secretary has been going through the Appropriations bill with a fine tooth comb and it will be scraped down to the bone. It is asserted on the authority of the administration, however, that economy will not be practiced to the point of neglecting the institutions of the State. Where repairs are needed they will be made. Appropriations which come under the general head of "pork barrel" will be swept aside.

It is conceded that there will be a direct tax. Senator Brown gave $12,000,000 as the minimum figure. Privately he and others say the sum will more likely be $15,000,000. It is the intention of the Republicans to "clean up" this year so that there will be no hang-over bills for next year and the Republicans may go flying into the next campaign year with a clean debit sheet.

One of the notable incidents of the week will be the hearing in the Executive Chamber on the so-called cannery bills, which permit canning factories to employ women and children for long hours. These measures have been buffeted from house to house, but finally, after spectacular battles, have been put through. Perhaps no legislation of the session has stirred up more excitement.

The advocates of the bills—some of whom own large interests in canning facorties—say they have no desire to overwork women and children, but in some sections of the State the canning business is over-rushed during certain seasons and women and children at such times are just as eager to work overtime as the owners are eager to have them. It means additional money for both.

The opponents of the bill argued that these bills are the first letting down of the bars; that the enactment means a return to the "slavey" days abolished by the factory commissions. The hearing before the Governor promises to be one of the largest of its kind ever held.

TAXPAYER OBJECTS TO PROSPECTIVE SUIT TO OBTAIN WATER RIGHTS

Editor Times:—

After considerabe discussion of the conveyance of the water rights of the Johnson Spring as set forth in the proceedings of the Common Council published in the Evening Times of April 7th, the following paragraph seems to leave settled the water for the present, nig:

"City Attorney Fanning advised relief for Mr. Johnson, but he said the only medium would be a suit against the city. Mr. Betts said that was agreeable to him and accordingly action will probably be brought in the near future."

Now, as a taxpayer and citizen we deem it proper to ask Mr. Fanning why it is that he so readily "advises" that the "only medium" by which an honorable and amicably satisfactory adjustment of this matter might not be found in some other way than by "a suit against the city".

We need not go very far afield to find a reason why such a method of settlement would be found "agreeable" to both Mr. Betts and City Attorney Fanning. But, be it remembered that (1) litigation is something which it is always well to avoid if possible, and (2) in a law suit the winner is always more or less a loser, and (3) the most substantial winner is the attorney who receives the largest fee.

Now, Mr. Fanning, you are one of our city officials whose public duty it is to conserve the best interests of our citizens generally and the taxpayers in particular, and it is very fitting that you shall answer through the press, for us who pay the bills, the following questions, viz:

1st. Have you advised, or tried to bring about any effort whereby this matter might be adjusted agreeably to both parties concerned without the very large and—many of our taxpayers believe—unnecessary expense of litigation?

2d. When you "advised relief of Mr. Johnson" by the "only medium" of a "suit against the city" did you remember the very large fees the taxpayers must pay to the attorneys, in addition to the "relief" sued for?

A commission composed (say) of one citizen chosen by our Chamber of Commerce, one by the Mayor and a third selection by these two would, we feel sure, find a righteous adjustment of this matter WITHOUT THE LARGE EXPENSE of litigation. This method would, of course, deprive you, Mr. Fanning, of your very desirable fees, but it would free you from all suspicion of graft and be eminently satisfactory to the taxpayers. May we not hear from you Mr. City Attorney?

TAXPAYER.

ODENWALD'S FAILURE TO AID DROVE CRUISER TO PORT

Washington, April 12.—That the arrival of the German sea raider Kronprinz Wilhelm at Newport News marks the failure of a pretentious German scheme to keep the Prinz Eitel, the Kronprinz Wilhlm and the Odenwald at sea preying on enemy commerce is the opinion generally held here.

There is now little doubt that the Kronprinz Wilhelm was lying in wait in Caribbean waters when the Odenwald attempted to make her dash from San Juan harbor and that it was the assistance of the replenished Kronprinz Wilhelm that Captain Thierrichens, of the Prinz Eitel, was counting on for his dash from Newport News past the cordon of French and British war ships off the Virginia capes.

But the vigilance of the United State customs and military authorities at San Juan prevented the Odenwald from steaming and illness and shortage of supplies forced the Kronprinz Wilhelm to seek shelter in Hampton Roads alongside the Prinz Eitel. So the last of the German sea raiders has been obliged to give up the game and the German flag is practically swept at last from the high seas on this side of the world.

Russian Troops Control Carpathians, Moving Down Slopes Into Valleys

London, April 12.—The Russian advance in the Carpathians is more and more resembling the movement of a steam roller that, heavy, slow and ponderous as its movements, is, regards no obstacle and stops neither for straw nor bowlder. The great masses of troops collected in Galicia to force the boundary of Hungary are rolling foot by foot over the mountains and in some places have penetrated the southern valleys. Reports, unofficial, but apparently reliable, assert Grand Duke Nicholas' forces are approaching, if they are not already in, the valley south of the pass of that name.

It seems well established by the comparatively meagre and contradictory official communications from this theatre that the Russians are in possession of all the central ridge of the Carpathians.

Fighting is going on under extremely difficult conditions, the grond being covered with snow which is commencing to soften, while the Austro-Germans continue to bring up reinforcements in an endeavor to check the advance. The Russians, however, appear to have confidence in their ability to handle the task, for simultaneously they are showing considerable activity both on the East Prussian frontier, where they say they are meeting with success over the Germans, and to the south of the Vistula, where the Germans say they have repulsed a Russian attack.

The French offensive in the Woevre, according to official reports from Paris, continues to make progress, although the Germans reiterate that all the French attacks have been repulsed. It is believed here these oprations are but prelude to a big general effort in the west.

With the two general staffs in direct conflict, it is difficult to guage the results of the fighting. Military experts here, however, express the conviction that the Germans will be compelled to send reinforcements to strengthen their wedge which penetrates to St. Mihiel and which is being attacked on both flanks, and that as soon as this movement begins the Allies will strike at the point thus weakened, and perhaps at the whole line.

The allied fleet has, according to unofficial reports, been bombarding the Dardanelles forts from the Gulf of Saros. This doubtless is being done to prevent the Turks from repairing the forts, for it is not believed here the big attack will be resumed until the land forces arrive.

Unofficial reports also continue to come in regarding the gun-firing off the Norwegian coast on Wednesday night last, concerning which the Admiralty as yet has made nothing public. The Scandinavian newspapers are convinced a sea battle has occurred, although they cariously describe it as a battle between British and German cruisers and a chase by British or German submarines.

GREAT BRITAIN MAY BUY BREWERIES FOR MONOPOLY

London, April 12.—State monopoly of beer is, according to the Daily Express, the solution which the government has under consideration for the problem raised by Mr. David Lloyd George, Chancellor of the Exchequer, in connection with the supply of munitions of war. Two bedrock principles, it is asserted, underlie the scheme as follows:—Only beer to be brewed or drunk in the United Kingdom will be permitted by the government, and no strong or heavy beer will be brewed and sold by the government, light beer of the lager type being alone supplied.

Mr. Lloyd George is personally responsible for the initiation of the scheme, which in general outline has the approval of the entire Cabinet. The Daily Express declares an agreement has been reached on the following details:

All breweries and licensed houses in Great Britain are to be purchased outright.

Ireland is included in the scheme, as otherwise there would be competition with the government monopoly from the famous Irish firm of Guinness.

Light beer of the lager type will be the main output of the government breweries and no strong or heavy beers will be manufactured.

The purchase money estimate amounts to between $1,000,000,000 and $1,500,000,000. Very little will be paid in cash. Brewers, mortgagees, shareholders and other concerned will be paid in the great majority of cases in licensed bonds bearing four per cent. interest.

The complete scheme, it is expected, will be ready in a few days. Optimistic expectations are based on it, especially from a financial point of view. Large economies are estimated to be possible by closing the overlapping and competing breweries, by shutting up unnecessary public houses, by brewing cheaper beer and by concentration of management.

"It is more like a teetotallers' nightmare than a piece of statecraft. The scheme is a socialist experiment on a vast scale and is an electioneering doge for the benefit of Mr. Lloyd George."

Direct Result of Free-Trade Tariff.

The figures show that low Tariff has not reduced the cost of living, but in every year of its existence it has destroyed the opportunities of earning a livelihood by putting American factories out of business and American workmen out of employment.

All of the low Tariff years have been marked by record-breaking business mortality and business depression.

The cause of the present widespread depression is clearly shown in the figures of the United States Custom House. These prove conclusively that closed factories and factories working on greatly reduced time all over the country are not the result of the war. On the contrary, this has been the means of temporarily opening many of them. The depression is the direct result of our present Free-Trade Tariff, under which a credit balance in our favor during 1913 of over six hundred ninety-one millions of dollars changed in five months to a debit balance of over thirty-nine millions, or at the rate of about one hundred millions per year against us.—Bristol (Pa.) Courier.

Men to Run the Barge Canal.

If the work on the Barge canal has been slow and drawn out, there has been no delay on the part of the State authorities in providing for men to take care of the locks and "operate them." Already for Civil Service Commission has held examinations for the position of lockmasters, assistant lockmasters and lock operators. It is the purpose to employ one lockmaster and several assistant operators at each of the locks—probably six or seven men, says a despatch from Albany. The eligible lists have just been published, so that the men are all ready to go to work when the weather becomes warm. No doubt these lockmasters, assistant lockmasters, and lock operators will begin to watch the locks this summer, although the canal will not be operated in several years. The assistant lockmaster will receive as much as some instructors in colleges and three times as much as the average pay of a school teacher, consequently one can see how important is this job of touching the button to open the locks. The pay of the lockmasters who boss the job will be around $1,800, while the salary of the assistant lockmasters who boss the lock operators who do the work will be from $1,200 to $1,500. Lock operators themselves will receive only $900 to $1,200.

This preparedness with men to fill the "places" constitutes a degree of foresight which has not always been displayed in the work on the big ditch. Incidentally, with six or seven high priced men falling over themselves at each lock, not to mention electrical engineers to keep the locks in working order, and the other employes along the canal, one may see that it is going to cost something to keep the canal going.—Utica Observer.

DO IT NOW

A clean-up week followed thereafter by clean-up regulations would do as much to establish a general civic pride as any movement that could be developed to "know-your-city."

If it be true that cities are as much our homes as the houses we live in then cleanliness and order are as necessary in a city as they are in the individual homes. Orderly, attractive homes leave an impression on the chance visitor. Orderly and attractive cities likewise leave an impression. The city spick and span, attractive, orderly, clean and beautiful is not the result only of a week's clean-up-campaign. However, such a campaign is an excellent beginning, and the desire for a clean attractive city receives its impetus.

When, in a general way, the people of a city think in terms of cleanliness and order and beauty then and then only can a city become a "City Beautiful." Aside from the fact that such a city is a happier place to live in, one can not escape the knowledge that in a commercial way, in dollars and cents, the effort is worth while. Every property owner, even though minus any civic pride should go forth and hustle for a clean, beautiful city because in dollars and cents it brings its rich returns.

Fulton should make its debut in clean-up circles this spring. Once the beginning is made the growth and effectiveness of such a movement would be apparent.

VETO THE CANNERIES BILL

Governor Whitman should veto the canneries bill which the Legislature has just sent to him. Whether he views this legislation as a matter of politics or principle, it will still be desirable for him to veto it. From either angle it is lamentable that the Republicans in the Legislature passed it. It would be incredibly stupid and dangerous for the Governor to fall in with them in supporting so vicious a measure.

This state has taken a definite, positive stand against the exploitation of women and children by conscienceless employers. The public mind is entirely made up on the subject. There should be no backward step. Economically child labor and overlong work by women are waste. They cost the state actual dollars. Instead of making these unfortunates "producers," as Senator Brown argues, such a policy robs the state of a great share of their productive power. It spends more than it brings in. Some legislators possibly do not know that; greedy employers don't want to know it. Governor Whitman, as Chief Executive of this state, must not shut his eyes to it, for it is cold, hard fact.

Still less should he shut his eyes to the effect of this bill on the individuals concerned. On the one side are a few canners—not a majority of those in that business, by any means—who expect to grow sleek and rich on the proceeds of the toil of women and children days, night, Sundays, at 10 cents an hour. On the other side are these women and children, breaking down their nervous systems, ruining their health, not working cheerfully, but driven in competition with machines in noisy, unsanitary, moisture-reeking factories for a mere pittance.

Against every consideration of decency and public welfare, of intelligence and disinterestedness, the Republican leaders in the Legislature forced this bill through practically as a party measure. Why they should be so generous to a few canners is something they will have to explain to the state at the next election. Unless Governor Whitman desires to fasten the burden of public disapproval irremovably upon his party and include himself in the condemnation certain to be visited on those who voted for this bill he must veto it. —New York Tribune.

Settling Day.

The wickedness of the Albany administration seems to be that it wants to pay the state's debts, current obligations and start with a clean slate. The Republican party turned over the state clear of debt and with a balance on January 1st, 1911. It took it back this year with the surplus missing and a lot of debts to pay. All last fall the taxpayers were told that Governor Glynn had saved $11,000,000. The Wilson Democrats conducting the affairs of New York city through the grace of Republicans, assured the electors that really and truly, Governor Glynn had saved the money and that Judge Whitman was in error in disputing the statement. All this year the same forces have been shouting that the state doesn't owe much of anything, that there is no need of a state tax of consequence, etc., etc. In relays the Mitchels, the McAneneys and the organizations which boost them have been trotting to Albany and back to give the country brethren advice in finance. The ruralite is not so accustomed to talking in millions as the men handling New York's tens and hundreds of millions, but usually he has acquired more of the world's goods in a business way then the lead pencil financier. The upstater listens, exhibits the overdue accounts, calls attention to the financial sins of omission as well as commission and guesses he will settle up. In the early stages of the finance agitation the Democratic position was that the state didn't owe the money and need not assess a direct tax. Today the debt is admitted, but the argument is that the day of settling should be put over, that is, the state should follow the city's example and resort to taxation while it is possible to fund debts in bond issues.

We are now informed that the city authorities propose to show what the administration budget contains. A start was made by criticism of an appropriation for repairs to a road exceeding the cost of the road put down by a Democratic commissioner of highways. That isn't a remarkable incident. There are cases on record where repairs at state cost began on one end of a ten mile road before construction has been completed on the other end. But that, judged as extravagance, doesn't strike the average upstate man as worse than private baths and masseurs for municipal officers.

There isn't any tax question before the state aside from that of paying up. We owe the money. Governor Glynn cleaned up the debts Sulzer took over from Dix and added to. He started with a surplus, but he cared so much more for a bookkeeping economy than for a balanced ledger that he failed to raise enough money to run the state on the lines he had laid down in his budget. The present administration has the choice of paying or repudiating. The choice brings a direct tax. If the treasury were to be put in the condition in which the Democrats found it in 1911, $18,000,000 wouldn't suffice.—Watertown Standard.

ALBANY LETTER DAY BY DAY

Cardozo Tells Times Readers the Doings of Officials and Lawmakers

By Frederic T. Cardozo

Albany, April 12.—Since Governor Whitman is of the opinion that some of the duties now required of the executive should be taken from him and transferred to the lieutenant-governor, and that action of this character should be taken by the Constitutional Convention, the prediction has been made that the pardoning power may be one of the prerogatives which will be reassigned.

Governor Whitman is not the only governor of New York State who has felt that the duties of his office are too manifold to permit the minute scrutiny of circumstances surrounding the trial and conviction of a man seeking executive clemency. Back in 1867 Governor Fenton expressed himself as favoring the transferring of that privilege to a board. Both governors Dix and Glynn mildly echoed the idea.

Although Governor Whitman has not expressed his views as to what duties should be taken from the governor, it is understood that the power to pardon or extend executive clemency is one of the duties which he would like to see no dealt with at the forthcoming Constitutional Convention.

When applications for either pardons or a lesser degree of executive clemency are made, there is necessarily a considerable amount of red tape to be unravelled which require a governor to assist in. Frequently he has not the time to review the exhaustive testimony taken in a case or in the cases; for as a matter of fact, there are upwards of two hundred and fifty pardons requested every year. The number varies and it is not infrequent that the requests are far greater in number.

Unless the district attorney who brought about the conviction and the judge who imposed the sentence approves of an application for executive clemency, there is indeed very little prospect of it being extended. Often when a judge who has imposed a sentence communicates with the governor, stating that he thinks the conviction of a prisoner was a mistake, a pardon is immediately granted by the governor. There are cases on record where the district attorney who secured the conviction did not learn until months afterwards that the man he had prosecuted successfully had been set free by the governor.

Cases such as are cited above are by no means frequent, however. As a general rule when an application is made for a pardon the governor feels it a duty to read a mass of testimony, delve into the prison record of the unfortunate who has applied for freedom and consult with his pardon clerk and various other officials who have a far deeper knowledge of the case at hand than he himself has.

It is suggested that there be an amendment to the State Constitution providing for a Pardoning Board of four members, such board to be non-partisan. It is also suggested that in order to prevent the granting of too many pardons, that all four members of the board shall have voted in favor of the liberation of a convict.

While in the majority of cases full justice is accorded, there crops up now and then, it is said, a case which involves intricate questions of fact which in order to be fully understood, require deliberation and careful investigation as to the advisability of granting a pardon. It is not unusual for the governor to receive requests not to pardon when a movement has been made to obtain the release of an inmate of one of the penal institutions of the State. The requests must necessarily be investigated when they are opposed to the granting of a pardon as well as those which are favorable to the prisoner.

MORE RELIGION NEEDED IN OUR LIVES DAILY.

Priest Deprecates Lack of Certain Elements In These Times.

The need of faith and the infusion of more religion into daily life were the themes of Rev. Father Lindsman in his sermon at the Church of the Immaculate Conception yesterday. The priest told the story of St. Thomas who doubted the resurrection of Christ until he had seen the Lord with his own eyes, and quoted the words of Christ blessing those who have faith even though they do not see.

Father Lindsman cited the case of a prominent English lawyer, a convert to Catholicity, who spent hours each day before the altar and he recommended that the people of this age use more religion in their daily life.

The choir rendered the Easter program of music and it was announced that on Pentecost Sunday there would be a special musical program.

The Living Rosary Society, met after the mass in the church and Father Lindsman announced that the Holy Name Society would receive Holy Communion in a body next Sunday. The entire center aisle of the church will be reserved for the communicants, who will meet in the basement of the church at 7:45 next Sunday morning.

BABY CITY FOUR SANG YESTERDAY IN SYRACUSE.

The Baby City four of this city, were warmly received yesterday afternoon in Syracuse where they appeared at the Memorial Services of the Order of Moose of that city. The quartet rendered "Nearer My God to Thee" and "Rock of Ages" during the service.

After the ceremonies a general good time was enjoyed and the local songsters contributed several popular numbers to the evident appreciation of their audience. Bert Williams' sensational success "It's Too Late Now" was given in an original and pleasing manner and the Fultonians were forced to respond to numerous encores.

Those making the trip were James Keeler, Len Roy, Chad Appleton, and Parker VanBuren comprising the quartet, E. J. LaPorte accompanist, and J. R. Perchway, manager. The local contingent attended the performance at the Grand in the evening.

ANS MATURING MOTOR CLUB

Quarters Among Things Talked for Promotion of Popular Sport

Plans are already under way for the organization of a Fulton motor club. There are at present upwards of 30 motorcycle owners in the city alone and possibly that many more live near enough to the city to join the local club and share the benefits which would accrue from membership. The promoters of the organization plan to rent a suite of rooms in the downtown section for meetings and social times and the club will make regular road runs every Sunday and probably hold contests and endurance trials under its auspices.

The club planners also propose to make stringent rules regarding the behavior of its members within the city and the cut-out, smoke and speed fiends will be given short shrift. In other cities motorcycle clubs properly managed have been the means of placing the two wheeled machines on a higher plane as regards public opinion and their activities in setting speed rules for the members have eliminated many protests against the motors. The social side of the idea is not overlooked and with the omnipresent side car, the club members are able to entertain the fair sex and their friends on the runs. Many clubs experience no difficulty in making runs of 200 miles or more every Sunday and some do even better than that. The roads in this section permit of long trips and when a large number of riders tour together the interest is greater.

TRADE EXPANSION.

[Dun's Review.]

Influences favoring business are now more numerous and potent and there is unmistakable trend toward expanding activity. In certain lines conservatism continues the controlling policy and thus there is some irregularity, with the aggregate of transactions below producing capacity, trade development naturally being subject to the changes and checks produced by the international crisis. The April Government crop report, notwithstanding rather unfavorable March weather, contains bright promises of another great yield of winter wheat at the very time when the world's needs are largest and when it will contribute most to the prosperity of the country. The recent advance in cotton, although there has been some reaction this week, is even more vital to the restoration of good business conditions, for it serves to protect the South, which is so dependent upon this crop, from the poverty resulting from prices below costs of production. Financial conditions continue favorable. The securities market maintains much of its recent activity, and while there has been more or less foreign selling, the liquidation has on the whole been readily absorbed, and every week contributes to the release of this country from its foreign obligations and to the upbuilding of a commanding financial independence. Exports continue very heavy, and during the latest week they exceeded the imports by more than $21,500,000—a large gain over the previous week. Bank clearings, while still running behind the last two years, nevertheless, make a better exhibit than in the earlier months this year and this reflects the gradual improvement. Buildings permits in March were $60,868,623 at 82 cities and compare with $67,823,969 last year, but this falling off is not after all as great as might have been expected. March iron production was larger, in rate per day, than at any time since last April, and a bigger steel output is correspondingly reflected; this, notwithstanding that the railroads continue conservative in their purchases. The improvement in the cotton goods trade is marked, and while there is continued concern over the cutting off of supplies of foreign dyestuffs, it is not believed that this will involve any net enlargement of mill idleness. The weather has not on the whole, been conducive to retail expansion, but advices from the principal cities clearly indicate greater activity. Hitherto demand has been of the "small lot for immediate requirements" order, an expensive kind of business to handle, but there are here and there signs of more readiness to buy for future consumption.

Since the beginning of January there has been a net gain of 44 in number of active blast furnaces, and the yearly rate of pig iron output has risen from 18,000,000 to 26,000,000 tons. During March the production averaged 66,575 tons a day, according to The Iron Age, against 59,813 tons in the previous month, while the 191 furnaces in operation on April 1 had a daily capacity of 70,591 tons, as compared with 63,033 tons for the 176 reported on March 1. Advices from Pittsburgh indicate that some of the smaller steel mills are working much below capacity and the situation is rather unsatisfactory in certain miscellaneous departments, but running time at the larger plants is fairly well maintained. There has been no especial activity in the rail trade and equipment orders generally fall short of expectations, while fabricating contracts develop slowly. No radical change is noted in prices, forward business being at a slight advance over current quotations, with steel bars, shapes and plates ruling at $1.20 for the second quarter. Irregularity is shown in pig iron, concessions being available in some directions, while Buffalo sellers, in response to the recent large buying movement, have raised No. 2X to $13 for any delivery.

About Sports Generally

By Frank G. Menke

The Federal League, which pried the lid off the 1915 baseball season Saturday, promises to furnish fandom with the real major league brand of baseball and a real battle for the pennant.

There are eight clubs in the junior league and eight clubs look to have a chance for the big honors. There never was a league in which the whole circuit seemed as evenly balanced as in the Federal League this year.

The Pittsburg club, when we saw it in its training camp, struck us as being one of the best looking outfits that ever was gathered together. It is a team that seems to be strong in every department and with a secondary outfit almost as powerful as the first.

Then there's those Indianapolis Feds, who rank as the greatest slugging outfit in baseball history. The team had nine or ten .300 hitters last year and the team as a whole, averaged close to .300 in clubbing. It seems just as strong—even stronger—this year than last and the team that beats Indianapolis probably will be the team that gets the pennant.

Joe Tinker's Chicago Whales certainly will be in the fight. Josephus has the greatest collection of pitchers in the Federal League. He has a fine lot of catchers, a wonderful outfield and an amazingly fast infield.

Those Baltimore fellows, who put up such a game fight in 1914, threaten to repeat in 1915. The pitching staff has been strengthened greatly by the addition of "Chief" Bender, the old Athletic star. "Snipe" Conley, a cub last year, is to make his debut as a regular this year and it's a cinch bet that the kid wonder will win two-thirds of his games at least.

Another club to watch is Larry Schlafly's Buffalo aggregation. It is speedy, it has pitchers that are real pitchers, a fast infield with the "Peerless" Hal Chase as its particular star, and a fine outfield. Also it has catchers that can hit, throw and catch with the best men in the business.

On paper, the St. Louis team doesn't look overly powerful. But it has a manager who has the ability to win pennants no matter what sort of material he has to operate with. Fielder Jones won a pennant back in 1906 with the White Sox team, that never looked as good as the Sloufeds do today. As the season advances those Sloufeds undoubtedly will improve and furnish trouble all the way.

The Brookfeds have a boy manager in Lee Magee. It is a team of veterans. But its veterans still are great ball players. The team as a whole hit like a bunch of fiends during the training camp season. If it hits with only two-thirds of its spring power and if its pitchers show up in the expected way it is certain that the Brookfeds will be considerably among those present.

The team that George Stovall will pilot this year [illegible] Newark, N. J., colors is another one that looks like a real ball club. It has everything a ball club needs—speed, good pitchers, batters, a fine infield, a steady, hard hitting outfield and a bunch of youths with brains. Stovall's club didn't do so well last year when it represented Kansas City, but the team has been strengthened since the 1914 season closed.

Every club has a chance—and a fine one. The fight for the pennant honors ought to be a great one, right into the home stretch.

REV. WELLBURN PRAISED SUNDAY

Delegation of Penna. Ministers Visited Syracuse Yesterday in Interest of Sunday's Campaign

A delegation of local people yesterday journey to Syracuse to hear the twenty ministers and laymen from Scranton and vicinity tell of the result of Billy Sunday's work upon northern Pennsylvania.

Rev. George Wellburn, formerly of this city, was one of the delegates and spoke at the mass meeting which was held in the Y. M. C. A. W. J. Lovejoy, who was present, stated Mr. Wellburn in his usual fair-minded presented both sides of the question and ended by declaring that the ultimate results were sufficient to warrant the worth of such a campaign.

Mr. Wellburn declared that men learned that working for Jesus Christ is just as important and profitable as their work in any other direction. He declared that it is impossible to predict who will be the strongest man in the church after this campaign.

"The men who are solid in your church want to look out," said Mr. Wellburn, "because they may find some one else taking hold of their job. These new people want work to do and they are full of energy. If you vote against this campaign now, you will lose the fruits when they begin to come in. The church that believes the most in the campaign will get the greatest results in its history."

Because of the success yesterday in presenting the Sunday issue, S. B. Groner, secretary of the Y. M. C. A., announced that he would have a delegation of "trail hitters" from Scranton next Sunday afternoon at the Y. M. C. A. These men will make the trip to Syracuse in a special car over the Lackawanna. There will be about forty in the party and a chorus of thirty. Secretary Groner declared that it would be a regular Pentecost. He urged the men to be "on the job" and not mere "bench warmers."

At the mass meeting, some of the ministers used Billy Sunday slang, but for the most part it was eliminated. In the church at morning and night services, they talked seriously of the results of the campaign. They spoke of the great necessity of leading a Christian life, declaring that God seeks this class of people just as much as he does the fallen. They declared that in Scranton and Wilkesbarre men and women inall walks of life have been brought into church activities and that the community is better for it in every way, as a result of the compaign.

Billy Sunday has some catchy songs for his meetings that border on rag time, and two of these stirred the afternoon audience to enthusiasm. Rev. George W. Wellburn, of Scranton, played the music and it did not take the audience long to catch on to the words and tune. Secretary Groner saw Rev. Dr. Edmund A. Burnham in the gallery and asked him to sing the chorus of "Bright in the Corner," and Dr. Burnham proved right then and there his ability as a singer as well as a preacher.

When it came to the "Brewers' Big Horses Can't Run Over Me," the audience joined in the chorus with much fervor. Pastor F. D. Cornell sang the verses. The song is snappy and these lines especially catch the house: "The turnpike is free where'er I go, I'm a temperance engine, don't you see, he brewers' big horse can't run over me."

Rev. James Leishman was the first speaker. He declared that the Sunday campaign was the greatest inspiration he ha ever experienced. It doubled his Sundayschool and brought new men into the church who are now working energetically in the upbuilding of every department. The new energy is getting money together for an addition to the Sunday school rooms, he said.

Rev. Mr. Lynch of Carbondale said that as the result of the Scranton campaign 1,150 men and women were saved. Carbondale is sixteen miles distant from the scene of the revival. He declared that Sunday has a greater effect upon the welding of all interests of the church than any other agency with which he has ever come into contact.

Rev. L. M. Kelly declared that there are hundreds of men walking the streets who are sick of sin but do not know how to get out of it. They decline to put themselves in the hands of the minister, but Sunday can touch them. Mr. Kelly declared that some persons object to the way Sunday talks, but just the same he found that Sunday and God are on familiar terms and that Sunday is able to place the man of every day life in touch with God. Mr. Kelly made an appeal for personal work before and after the campaign.

Rev. Dr. C. S. Guthrie declared that there is no room for mollycoddles in the work and that the campaign calls for men of endurance. He declared that there has been no influence on earth since the days of Jesus Christ equal to that of Billy Sunday.

Several Syracuse ministers went to Scranton to occupy pulpits of men who gave the day to the campaign scheduled for this city in November.

CONFERENCE TO CLOSE TUESDAY

Appointments to Be Made. Many Changes Will Be Made

Yesterday in seven churches in Oswego special services were held to open the annual meeting of the New York Conference of the Methodist Episcopal church. The principal service was held at Trinity church and Rev. S. T. Dibble of Potsdam was the leader.

At 10.30 o'clock the morning service was held. The sermon was preached by Rev. Dr. John W. Hamilton of Boston, the presiding bishop. Long before the service began the church was filled with people and many were compelled to stand. It is estimated more than 1,000 persons weer assembled in the edifice.

Surrodaing Bishop Hamilton on the altar, sat the superintendents of the various districts of the conference and several of the most prominent clergymen in northern New York. The bishop began his sermon by telling of his work in the early part of his ministerial career, which led up to his topic, "I Have a Message to Thee from God."

The next session was held at 2 o'clock this afternoon. It was in the form of a memorial service in memory of the prominent Methodist ministers who died during the conference year. The names mentioned were Rev. M. D. Kinney, Rev. Leroy Grant and Rev. George W. Bent. Rev. Dr. Edward B. Topping of Ilion was the leader.

At 3 o'clock took place the annual ordination. A congregation which again filled the church was present. The orders and offices of the church were conferred upon fifteen men and one woman.

The following were ordained as elders: Rev. W. M. Brashears, W. T. Clemens, Evan Evans, C. M. Fulton, B. E. Pratt, P. O. Wilcox and R. P. Green. Ordained into full membership in the conference were: Rev. A. J. Green, Rev. Eugene D. Nixon, Rev. Arthur J. Schloop, Rev. W. A. Wright, Rev. B. J. Davidson and Rev. William H. Stimson. Rev. George Wilkson of Depauville and Rev. M. E. Hawley weer also ordained into the conference. Miss Alice Fry of Manlius was consecrated as a deaconess. Miss Fry was formerly connected with Folts Mission Institute.

The conference veterans' anniversary was held at 7.30 o'clock Sunday evening. Rev. Dr. Edward B. Topping, president of the Preachers' Permanent Fund Commission, presided. Addresses were elivered by Rev. Dr. Frederick D. Keeney, pastor of the First M. E. church of Syracuse, and Rev. Dr. Samuel J. Greenfield of Utica. A special musical program was rendered.

A large audience attended the temperance anniversary last night at which addresses were delivered by Rev. Charles True Wilson of Chicago and Rev. William H. Anderson, superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League Rev. D. C. Johnson of Watertown presided.

The conference which has been in session since last Tuesday will close tomorrow afternoon.

Important resolutions affecting the conference will likely be adopted. The last important business will be the reading of the appointments made by Bishop Hamilton. These will be announced prior to the close of the final session.

The appointments are regarded by the ministers as the most important matter of the conference. Many transfers will be made, while in other cases pastors will be returned to their present charges. It is expected that Rev. William H. English, pastor of Trinity church, and Rev. Jabez Stallwood of the First M. E. church, Oswego, will be returned.

The program for tomorrow follows:

Morning, 8 o'clock devotional hour, conducted by Rev. Edgar H. Brown, D.D., of Utica; subject, "Pledges of Power." 8.30, conference session.

Afternoon, 1.30, conference session.

Maynard [illegible] Beach, Edgar D. Brown, Walter S. Dobbie, Joseph S. [illegible]ridge, Albert A. Lawrence, Ernest C. Love, Arthur R. Myers, Robert F. Thomas, Philip Tonkin, Bertram A. [illegible]ton, Thomas J. Williams, Robert E. Wrigley. These have completed the conference course of study: Wallace M. Brashears, Wilbur T. Clemens, [illegible], Evan Evans, [illegible] E. Moody, [illegible].

SEMINARY UP FOR SALE

Old Falley Premises in Hands of Real Estate Agents.

A rumor this morning stated that the Gilmour heirs, convinced that the city does not mean to take advantage of the option on the Falley Seminary site to purchase the property, have placed the property in the hands of a New York realty firm for sale. The citys' option on the property expires July 1 and of course the property cannot be sold until that time, but if the Gilmour agents can get the right price for the property the sale will be completed at that time.

Some time ago the Falley site was proposed for the new High school which must be erected in a very short time. Its location is certainly desirable, but there were some objections to it because of the price, although it is said that the Gilmour heirs turned down an offer better than the one tendered by the city in order that the property might go to the city for a school site. The supporters of the Falley site claim that the building now on the landw ill serve for a new High school for some time to come but others claim that the place would be condemned in a very short time.

The proposition made by the Gilmour heirs—that the city should pay the purchase price at the rate of $1000 a year is certainly a very reasonable one, as the city pays that amount to the estate in rents for the rooms now used in the building.

MRS. LOIS VAN BUREN

Mrs. Lois Alma Van Buren, 65, widow of Edgar Van Buren, died this afternoon at her home, No. 421 Rochester st., after a long illness. The funeral will be held at her late home at 2.30 p.m. Wednesday and burial will be in Mount Adnah cemetery.

W. H. ANDERSON SPOKE SUNDAY

Addressed Members of Rev. Chas. Olmstead's Parish, Predicting Ultimate Triumph for League

There was a good sized audience at the Congregational church Sunday morning although there were few present, outside of the regular attendants at the church. The address of the morning was given by Superintendent William H. Anderson of the Anti-Saloon League of New York State. The speaker showed the great strides that have been made by the temperance movement throughout the world and in many sections of this country where the number of prohibition states has been increased frm nine to eighteen within a very short time, with several other states which look for action in that direction in the near future.

Mr. Anderson showed the progress that has been made in many states in the country, particularly Illinois, where the recent passage of a local option temperance bill has closed more than 1,000 saloons in a single day.

Mr. Anderson said that the enfranchisement of women in Illinois had also worked wonders for the prohibition cause. He showed a map which indicted that the greater part of that state has become dry territory. In the marked advance of public sentiment which is freely recognized even by the liquor traffic due credit is given to the W. C. T. U., the Prohibition party and other agencies. It is now understood that the Anti-Saloon League is recognized as the chief among prohibition organidations since the Civic League f this State has accorded to the league this provision.

Mr. Anderson explained the legislation for prohibition now under way at Albany and in closing he told of the best means that could be used toward furthering the cause in this section. A subscription of $45 was made for the league at the services yesterday.

MASSARO OPENS NEW GROCERY STORE HERE

Mr. Massaro is installing modern fixtures and a complete line of fancy and staple groceries of the highest grade. He will be equipped with a modren and free delivery service and, as he is a young man of some prominence and with many friends he will doubtless be very successful in his new enterprise.

EASTER PROGRAM REPEATED

The Easter program of music was repeated at the Zion Episcopal church yesterday by the choir and the regular morning service was in charge of the rector, Rev. M. J. Peters. Mr. Peters preached, taking as his text the first verse of the fifth chapter of St. Paul to the Corinthians.

At 5 o'clock in the afternoon there was a choral evensong service. The building committee of the church which was to meet Wednesday, will hold a meeting on Wednesday evening, April 21. Owing to the fact that several members of the committee are out of town the meeting for this week was postponed.

MANAGERS WANT NO CHANGE IN BOXING LAW

New York, April 12.—That boxing managers of this city are opposed to any change in the boxing laws of this State and that the public will have to stand the added tax of seven and one-half per cent. if the proposed law, now in Albany, is passed, was the gist of a statement given out last night by Charles J. Harvey, secretary of the State Boxing Commission.

Managers of boxing clubs at a meeting recently protested against any change, says Mr. Harvey. They argue, he says, that boxing is cleanly conducted now and that the law has served as an example for other Stotes. The added tax proposed will, he asserts, have to be paid by the public since few clubs are making both ends meet at present. The proposition to limit expenses and guarantees will mean inferior bouts throughout the State.

SCOUTS HEARD WORDS OF WISDOM LAST NIGHT

John R. Boardman, the well known boys' worker, addressed a large gathering at the First Methodist church last night on the occasion of the Union services for the Boy Scouts. Mr. Boardman who earned a national reputation as a Y. M. C. A. worker, but who has been connected with the Boy Scout organization for sme time, delivered a very interesting and concise talk. He told of the possibilities in work among boys and of some if his erperiences in the work and showed how the work must be carried on in order to produce the best results.

Mr. Boardman portrayed the model Boy Scout and told his youthful listenes to what end they should strive and what the purpose of their organization was. CICERO HERD KILLED TODAY

A Herd of 28 Cattle To Be Killed Today; Othef Cases Springing Up in County

Four cases of the hoof and mouth disease, which, it is believed, had their origin from skimmed milk, have been found in Oswego county during the last four days. The latest case was found yesterday on a farm near Cicero. There are twenty-eight cattle and ten hogs on the farm and all will be killed today.

Several other cases are under suspicion and officials said last night it would take a day or two to determine if the cattle are suffering with the disease. The officials believe that all the new cases were caused by the farmers taking the milk from a creamery station.

A herd was killed yesterday morning and officials are now turning their attention to the disinfection of the infected farms. The final inspection of the infected territorf southeast of the city is being carried on rapidly and officials are satisled that no new cases will be discovered although they have a few herds under surveillance.

Dr. Kennedy of this city has reported three cases found on the farm of B. H. Moyer, near Central Square. The entire herd of fifteen cattle has been exposed to infection and a close watch is being kept on the herd. The first three cattle discovered with the disease were immdiately killed.

REV. JOHN RICHARDS PREACHED YESTERDAY

The Rev. John Richards of Detroit, Mich., preached to a large and interested congregation at the First Methodist church yesterday morning. Mr. Richards delivered an earnest message to the people and at the close of the services he was cordially welcomed with a social half hour. Mr. Richards was formerly the pastor of the church here and his reception yesterday proved that his former parishioners have not forgotten him.

STATE CANNOT AFFORD TO WASTE PEOPLE'S MONEY

Not a Bill Sent Through Committees Until Legislators Make Sure That No Item Can Be Cut Out

Albany, April 3.—The State's appropriation bills are receiving very careful attention this year.

Confronted with the absolute necessity for a direct state tax both the ways and means committee of the Assembly and the finance committee of the Senate have scrutinized every item in the bills in their effort to cut out unnecessary appropriations, cut down items that are too large and yet not fail to make provisoion for the actual needs of the government.

It is in the failure to make provision for the actual needs of the state government that former administrations have produced the situation in which the state now finds itself. Last year, payroll items went through unquestioned except as the Assembly undertook to check them and that effort resulted in the Democratic senate deadlocking the Legislature and forcing an extra session.

Efforts on the part of the Assembly to induce the Senate to make proper and necessary provision for the maintenance of the canals, grade crossings, state institutions, pay for animals killed by the state and for numerous other purposes were mostly futile and where the senate consented the Governor cut out the items with his veto. As a result appropriations that should have been made last year were not made and must be made this year if the state is going to conduct its business properly. Provision has got to be made for the canals, for the state highways, for the state institutions and for legitimate department work. Putting off appropriations until next year is not going to result in saving money, because next year will [illegible] Keeping appropriations down to actual necessities is the most that can be hoped for.

The levying of a direct state tax is something that should be avoided if it were possible to avoid it. Eight years of Republican administration made possible in 1902 the abolition of the direct state tax as far as the constitution would permit and three years later a constitutional amendment made possible its entire abolition, and the state continued without a direct tax until the advent of a Democratic administration. Since then it has been regular up to the present year and there would have been one this year had the last administration made adequate provision to for the needs of the state government.

Because no direct state tax was levied by the Legislature of 1914, the state tax that must be levied this year will be about double what it would have been but for the policy of the last administration to push forward to this year appropriations that should have been made last year.

TWO NEW MANAGERS IN EACH MAJOR LEAGUE

By Menke

New York, April 12.—Another season of baseball will be started on its jubilant way this week, when the National and American leagues open the season tomorrow. The National League pennant race opens with a new interest, because this season the public will have a different champion to keep their eyes on in the Boston Braves. The slogan for several seasons has been "Watch the Braves."

It isn't going to be the easiest thing in the world for the Braves to repeat their success this year, according to the baseball sharps, because now that their real worth is known, it will be the object of all the cubs to play their strongest against the champions. That's one of the drawbacks against being a pennant winner, every body is against you.

New Experience for McGraw

The season will open at the Polo grounds Wednesday with a game between the Giants and Brooklyn. It is a new experience for Manager McGraw to start the season as just an ordinary member of the ranks, remarks the New York Times. His rivals are using [illegible]s. The Giants this year [illegible]nbition, and that is to w[illegible]e honors that Boston took fro[illegible]n in such spectacular fashion last season.

From present indications, it looks as if the Braves were just as good and even better than they were last season. If Sherwood Magee comes up to the standard expected of him, he will be a big help in bring another pennant to Boston.

Much also depends on Johnny Evers, after the World's Series, had a severe illness, which may or may not have an effect on his work during the coming season. However, it is a well known fact that Ever's work with the Bostons last season was the principal factor in the club's success. With Evers and Magee right, Boston has a glorious chance of repeating.

Expects Sluggers to Come Back

In strengthening the New York club, Manager McGraw has got another star pitcher in Pol Perritt and an expereienced, capable third basemon in Hans Lobert. With this added strength, McGraw also expects to the batting of Larry Doyle and Chief Meyers assume its former strength. Last season, when both of these players fell off in their batting, the Giants' chances faded gradually but surely.

Jeff Tesreau should be at the top of his pitching for mduring the coming year [illegible]d McGrew also puts much trust in [illegible]ability of Rube Marguard to show [illegible]ga[illegible] after his poor season last y[illegible]. The injury to George Burns will be a handicap to the team at the start, but the injured ankle should be as good as ever before the season is very far along.

Brooklyn showed marked improvement in the South this season and if the team does not get a good start

The Chamber of Commerce wants a slogan for use upon its letter head. It must be short, snappy and to the point. It must create an impression of alertness, activity, progressiveness and be in every way up-to-date.

A prize consisting of a $5.00 gold piece is hereby offered to the citizen of Fulton who submits the best slogan by the evening of Wednesday, April 14th. Send in your suggestions today. There is no limit to the number you may make.

Some interesting and valuable suggestions have already been received from a number of people. There are others with equally good ideas who have not been heard from. If you have not already sent in your answer do so now. If you have, send in some more. All will be carefully considered.

INSTRUCTION IS TO BE PART OF CHAMBER'S PLAN

Rochester Chamber of Commerce Campaign for Beautifying City Through Planting Shrubs and Vines

Rochester, April 13.—The campaign of the Flower City Committee of the Chamber of Commerce to beautify Rochester is getting under way in the various districts. District teams are calling meetings for this week at the chamber rooms to outline work. This means that the campaigners will shortly be in the field and that neighborhoods of former unsightliness may begin to brighten up and take on a trim and attractive appearance. In this connection it has been suggested that the Flower City and Fire Prevention committeees cooperate, it being argued that one must "clean up" before success will crown efforts to beautify premises with lawns, shrubs, vines, etc. The proposal was received by the Fire Prevention Committee at its last meeting and a reprsentative was named to confer with Chairman C. Solon Kellogg, of the Flower City Committee.

At a meeting of the teams full directions for conducting the campaigns in various districts will be given. One of the biggest helps to the campaigners will be the handbook of gardening information being printed. Ten thousand copies have been ordered, but will not be distributed promiscuously. In as much as the booklet is intended primarily for the guidance of unskilled gardeners, the committee desires to restrict it to meet the demand from those willing to enter the contest.

For convenience of reference, and as an aid in selecting the plant material best suited to produce effective groupings, classified lists of shrubs are given.

Thus, if a lot owner wishes to plant shrubs which will attain a height of seven or more feet, he will find a list of varities from which to select, likewise shrubs of dwarf nature suited for edging, etc.

Not all shrubs are adapted to shady places or north exposures. A suggested list of those which will thrive better than others under these conditions is therefore given.

After an intelligent selection of shrubs has been made, which will round out the groups, producing varied heights and pleasing outlines, the lot owner is requested not to interfere with the natural habit and beauty of the individual plant by pruning or trimming. The branches should sweep down and overhang the bare earth underneath. No one thing will contribute more in producing pleasing and beautiful effects than a careful observance of this rule.

Russians Capture Hill and Rest of Chain

London, April 13.—With the capture by the Russians of almost all the main chain of mountains, the battle of the Carpathians, which has lasted upwards of eighty days, yesterday apparently reaching a termination over one extensive front, an dthe Russians are said to be moving at various points by railways and roads and along the rivers and streams down the southern slopes towards the plains of Hungary.

This movement, if it continues successfully, will in the view of the Russian military authorities, compel the retirement, with little or no fighting, of the Austrians and Germans who are still north of the Carpathians, to the east of Uzsok Pass and in Eastern Galicia and Bukowina.

The battle was, from all accounts, one of the fiercest of the war, and the manner in which the Russians overcame the difficulties of mountain fighting in mid winter has been the subject of praise by those who witnessed the operations or are aequainted with the country traversed.

Change in the Woevre.

The first phase of the battle of the Woevre, apparently, has come to an end also, and interest now centers on the next move of General Joffre, the French commander, in his effort to compel the Germans to release their hold on St. Mihiel and that part of the plain of the Woevre included in their wedge. The capture of Les Eparges was, in the opinion of British military critics, a long step in the direction desired by the Allies, but they place even more importance on the advance from Regnieville toward Thiaucourt in the South, as the latter town is a railway centerf rom which the force at St. Mihiel draws its supplies.

No General Offensive Yet.

This battle has not as yet proved the prelude to a general offensive in the West, as was expected. This is probably due to the fact that instead of moving troops from other points along the line to assist the army of the Woevre, the Germans have fought their reinforcements from the interior of Germany, or perhaps right from the eastern front, and consequently the situation remains comparatively quiet on the western front.

German submarines have again been showing activity and besides the Harpalyce, which, according to one members of her crew and the officers of another steamer, was torpedoed, they have attacked since Saturday night the British liner Wayfarer, the French steamer Frederic Franck and the little steamer President. The Wayfarer reached Queenstown in a sinking condition; the Frederic Franck was towed into Plymouth and the President was still afloat when her crew of ten men left her.

The mystery of the North Sea firing on Wednesday night last remains unsolved so far as the general public is concerned.

LATE WAR BULLETINS

RUSSIA

Petrograd.—To the west of the middle Nieman there were isolated engagements yesterday. Near Ossowetz and in the region of Edvabno and between the Pissa and Omuleff rivers there were artillery duels. An attack by the Germans against the village of Szufronki failed.

In the Carpathians, in the direction of Rostoki, on April 10th we repulsed by our fire at short range large forces of the enemy which were repeatedly attacking us. We made some progress and in so doing developed a violent battle in the region of Uzsok pass, which the enemy still holds. We captured here three guns and about 700 prisoners.

In the direction of the Stry river we repulsed attacks on the Roppelce-Oravozil - Kozieuwka - Rozanka front; inflicting enormous losses on the enemy.

The enemy have held height 999 since April 9th, but Kozieuwka and the adjoining positions remain in our hands.

In the other sectors there has been no essential change.

FRANCE

Paris.—At Les Eparges during the night of April 11-12, after a somewhat severe cannonade and rifle fire, the Germans at 4:30 o'clock this morning delivered a counter attack, but were repulsed.

In the wood of Ailly and in the region of Flirey there were violent artillery actions, but no infantry engagements.

In the forest at Le Petre at about 8 o'clock yesterday evening an attempted attack by the enemy on the northwestern part of the "quart en reserve" was easily repulsed.

In Courie today we drove the Germans from a section of a trench line which they had previously captured and in which they had succeeded in holding their ground.

During the night of April 11-12, about 1:30 o'clock in the morning, a German dirigible airship dropped seven bombs on Nancy. One of these fell near the civilian hospital and another near a school. Two fires were caused by the bombs, but they were promptly extinguished.

AUSTRIA

Vienna.—The general situation is without change. In Russian Poland and in western Galicia there have been artillery engagements. In the Carpathians, especially in the district east of the Uzsok pass, several Russian attacks have been repulsed with heavy losses to the enemy. We took 600 prisoners. In Southeast Galicia and in Bukowina there have been some heavy artillery engagements.

GERMANY

Berlin.—Sunday was comparatively quiet on the western frontier, French attacks in the Argonne, against the Combres position, in the Ailly forest and in the forest of Le Pretre were all repulsed.

Inasmuch as an attack by the enemy resulted in the killing with bombs of three women in the open town of Muelheim, German bombs were dropped on the central group of fortifications at Nancy.

French officers who have been taken prisoner have informed the Ger-

FUN RAYS

By Ray I. Hoppman

FATHER.

OH, a father is a hero, worthy of the fame of Nero; he's a martyr and a lemon and a prince; he will spend his hard earned money, with a disposition sunny, and he'll shovel forth the coin without a wince. He will send his son to college, hoping that some useful knowledge will find lodgment in his hard and empty dome. And he'll work until his knuckles shine and glisten like brass buckles, just to keep things running smoothly in the home. He will dress his pretty daughter in a way that pains "oughter," till she rivals both a princess and a queen; when, a dollar to a shilling, he will dig his pockets, drilling for a dime to fill his jimmy pipe, I ween. Now, his wife will spend his boodle till he's dizzy in the noodle—spend it till there's not a Lincoln red to spare; yet he meekly acquiesces, sadly eyeballs his grayish trusses, and he never says a word—he doesn't dare. He gets a calling that smashes if he spills a little ashes on the tablecloth, the mantel or the floor. If he feels a little frisky, wants to take a nip of whiskey, why, it's apt to start a long domestic war. And they rage and yell and holler if he tries to spend a dollar for a little recreation unbeknown; it's no cinch to be a father, with a thousand woes that bother, and never have a penny of your own. But he's got to keep on working, there's no letting up or shirking, for it costs a wad of coin to run a home. And he's got to skip and hustle, pay the bills and jump and bustle—he must keep the cog wheels steady in his dome. Yes, the father is a martyr, he's the stopper and the starter, for the big expenses keep him on the run; paying bills and being father is a lot of doggoned bother, with a lot of woe and very little fun.

GARDENS IN CITIES

Robert Ingersoll once said one couldn't expect a man to shoulder a musket in defense of his boarding house. The love of home is necessary to love of country. To that end it is essential that every child develop an interest in his home.

Ne York City in recognition of this vital need has developed for its children the garden movement. The home garden, has been made an adjunct of the school. In the metropolis the 1900 acres of land that form back yards and vacant lots, thousands of boys and girls with proper guidance will this year utilize the unproductive land. They are now at work cleaning up back yards and vacant lots and dividing the land into plots. An experienced gardener instructs and the soil is examined and the qualities that are lacking are added.

Adolph Lewisohn who is chairman of the garden committee says:

"In England, Holland, France, Germany—in every European country, for that matter—every piece of ground is utilized, and the result of this cultivation is a beauty that our country lacks. The bald ugliness of American towns and cities is due in a large measure to this neglect of unoccupied ground. We pile up our vacant lots and the outskirts of our cities with tin cans, unsightly dumps, and all sorts of refuse. The first thing a foreigner notices when he comes to our country is this dreary ugliness. We shall do much to beautify our country if we encourage children's gardens."

The American people, according to an English visitor, are too unstable to be good gardeners. They move from house to house during the year, and they don't care to plant flowers and vegetables for some one else to enjoy. And it is just this lack of a home instinct that the garden enthusiasts would remedy by interesting the child in gardening.

"The movement has rapidly become one of national scope," Mr. Lewisohn continued. "In the cities where it has been tried on a large scale it has been a great success. In one New England city the 'toughest kids' in town were transformed into model young citizens while the most unsightly dumping ground was being transformed into a beautiful 'garden city.' We have great hopes for it here."

CONVENTION NOTES

"To preserve as well as to improve" the motto Mr. Root would have the members of the Constitutional Convention adopt. Evidently Mr. Root has no patience with the unthinking element of the proletariat which goes about crying out that representative government is "on trial." The existence of this Republic, its success in weathering storms that would have wrecked any other nation, its steady and certain growth to greatness, the splendid stability of its institutions—these facts answer that cry. Representative government has proved itself; if it has failed to cure all the defects of human nature it is because it is not government's business to make over men.—New York Herald.

* * *

The constitutional convention should frame a constitution in which there should be important changes and that constitution ought to be so written that it will receive the support of the voters at the election in November. Many members of the convention are among the ablest men in the State and their work ought not to go for naught provided it is good.

By their deeds the voters should judge them and not by preconceived notion as to what they may do.—Albany Evening Journal.

* * *

The people have sent their best representatives to this convention and where desirable men were not nominated or were defeated a way has been found to remedy the defect by resignation of others to create vacancies to be filled by them. Thus Judge Edgar N. Cullen, William D. Guthrie and William M. Ivins, all of New York city, will be added to the roll of distinguished delegates. It will be a notable convention and it is expected that it will do notable work.—Watertown Times.

* * *

There will be many questions submitted to this convention for consideration, debate and action, and the final results of its work for the coming months will be voted upon by the people in November. It is essential that all citizens of the state during the coming months become students of the questions which will come before this convention and that the voters qualify themselves to act intelligently in the performance of their duties on election day in November.—Albany Knickerbocker Press.

* * *

By the irony of fate, the constitutional convention which Chief Murphy put over with the idea of clinching the hold of Tammany on the State, is composed of 1116 Republicans and 52 Democrats.—Newburgh Journal.

* * *

It is safe to say that no startling innovation will be found in new constitutional draft. The character and disposition of the men whose opinions will carry weight with the delegates are a guaranty that the fads which have had considerable vogue in some recent constitutional conventions in other states will not be taken into serious consideration at Albany.—Rochester Democrat and Chronicle.

* * *

The constitutional convention which meets at Albany today includes a large number of the ablest men in the state. There can be no doubt that wisdom and dignity will characterize the proceedings. The people are to be congratulated that the convention is a very different body from that which would have been created had the plans of Tammany been successful.—Troy Times.

* * *

The constitutional convention organizes at Albany tomorrow. The convention includes in its membership many of the ablest minds of the State. Its deliberations as to the provisions of the fundamental law of the State will be intelligent and exhaustive.—Watertown Standard.

Opinions

Waste Basket Publicity

The Waste basket is an article of convenience that is to be found in nearly every office, study or library in the land and is the common receptacle for torn envelopes, scarps of paper, circulars and other useless things. Except when searching for some lost possession no one ever examines the contents of a waste basket, but these rare investigations always bring to light advertising matter received by mail and cast afay unopened.

Now, the waste basket cannot read circulars and is unable to buy any of the things that they seek to exploit. It has no need for corsets or groceries or clothing, no money to invest in dividend paying securities or to deposit in banks. And yet men of supposed commercial acumen spend large sums of money each year in futile attempts to convert the waste baskets of the country into customers. They might just as well address the garbage pails, and they undoubtedly would if they could only find a sure medium of communication.

The merchant who wishes to reach ten thousand waste backets must pay some one for writing his circular. The printing, the paper, the envelopes, the folding, the addressing and the postage stamps will bring the cost to a sum that, wisely spent in newspaper advertising, would make his wares known to an enormous number of possible buyers.—New York Herald.

Limitation of Working Hours.

It should interest those legislators who have been voting to impose long wrking hurs on wmen and children, to observe how a great corporation, run on an efficient basis, yet with decency and humanity, hondles that problem. The Western Union Telegraph Company has just announced that in all its large offices an eight-hour day for women employes is to take the place of a nine-hour day. Women who work at night work only seven or seven and one-half hours.

Intelligent employers know from experience that the over-long working period not only harms the empoye but the person who pays the wages. Especially is that true where the task is connected with machinery or falls into a dulling routine. Work suffers as the worker's powers deteriorate. Limitation of working houre is not alone a humanitarian project. It is sound business sense as well. On both counts it should be, and is, favored by right-minded employers of labor.—New York Tribune.

Full Crew Law Revision

Mr. William Barnes has a very large influence with the New York Legislature. His attitude for or against legislative measures, therefore, is important.

Mr. Barnes, as we understand his remarks on the subject before members of the Albany Chamber of Commerce, calls for the repeal of the Full Crew law without qualification. But we are sure that neither the New York railroads ask for that nor the people of New York want it.

The railroads object to the financial hardship of being compelled to carry men in crews and on payrolls when there is no work for them to do. The public objects to the economic wrong of having spent in that way, where it can do no good, money that, properly used in the right places, would do good to the the labor thus employed, to the railroads employing it and to the public getting the benefit of the useful service.

The railroads are willing to have such a modification of the present requirements as will relieve them of the compulsion of carrying and paying useless men on train crews, but at the same time will assure through action of the Public Service Commission or other authority, that there always shall be on crews all the men that are necessary to the safety of railroad operation and to the reasonable comfort and welfare of the railway employes themselves. The people of New York will be content with nothing less than that; but the railroads themselves, in asking for the revision of the Full Crew law to get rid of its abuses, suggest that ample provision be made for that very thing. So there is no occasion for Mr. Barnes to revise the revision they wish and need.

There is no doubt that if the voters of New York had the power they, exactly as the people of Missouri with their referendum powers did, would give the railroads what they request. Neither cheap politics nor any other reason, therefore, should delay the Legislature in extending the relief essential to the good management of railroads, the adequate reward of men that do work and the improvement of service for the public which foots the bills.—New York Times.

A CLOUDY DAY

BY
I. E. HYDE
N. Y.

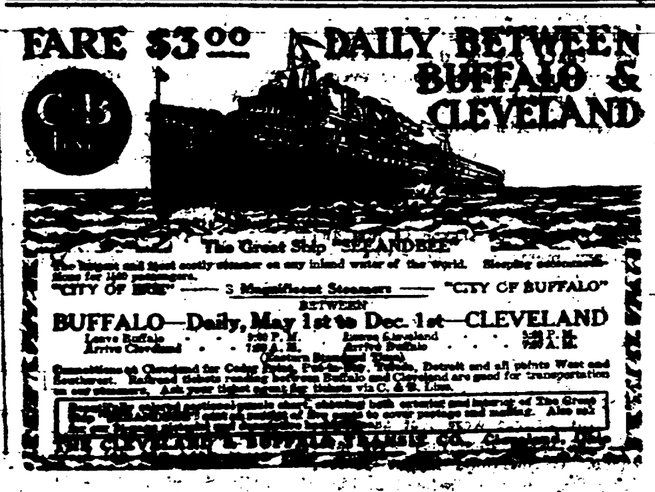
There's something clattering on the pane. Why, goodness me! It is the rain. Another cloudy day. The streets are dark, and cold and wet; the sun must be somewhere, and yet, he never shows a ray. The rain keeps drizzling, then he drips. You'd think he works for English tips, the way he's hanging 'round; he makes us shiver, shrivel, shrink with our raincoats; we don't think his policy is sound. We like the sun but not the rain, and I suppose 'twould be in vain to ask him to skidoo. But when the sun is shining hot, are we content? Well, I guess not; I never am, are you? We're ne'er content with place or time. I hope you think it is no crime for me to tell you so. I like to study human nature, I often find a human faker, who thinks he makes a show. In studying life from day to day, I find we are inclined to sway toward selfish inclination. You can't have sun without the rain; you can't have joy without a pain; so cease your acclamation. For after rain the sun is bright; in conquering pain, you win a fight, you're then so much the stronger. If darkness comes your way—you shine; if sickness—don't you dare repine; be human cowards no longer.

Anti Tarbell: Page from a Woman's Life

I am tired tonight. I have been threshing and fanning out beans by the old-fashioned hand method—which method, I may add, uses most of the human machine as well as hands. While I was working I was thinking of a number of things, among them Miss Tarbell.

The editor of Senator Hichcock's paper saw his duty clearly, and gave us mad suffragists another little dose. He directed us to notice the sterling worth of those women who are among the antis; women like Ida Tarbell, who devote themselves to their homes and families with never a yearn for a vote. In another column was a paragraph to the effect that the antis were hoping to get Miss Tarbell to speak for them if she could leave her arduous duties in Chicago, where she was engaged in investigating business conditions.

Now, the memory of man does not run back to the time when Ida was not investigating something. She is, in fact, a professional investigator. She dug up every heinous deed of Standard Oil, and laid bare every curious, and sometimes pitiful, fact of Mrs. Eddy's life. But as to home-staying or homekeeping she has not given us the history of either, nor has she set us a good example. She is not even married; therefore, she has no home in the domestic sense. I'll venture a guess that she never pounded out beans, and I am sure she does not turn a sack of flour into bread every week or ten days.



If it is a question of home-staying, I, myself, can make a try for the championship, and win at least honorable mention. There were over five years in my life when home-staying was my steady occupation. During that time I never attended church services, nor any lecture, social, party, or any recreation or diversion of any kind more than an occasional visit with a next-door neighbor. During those years of small babies and ill-health, all that kept me from falling into utter stagnation was the connection with general humanity furnished by the newspapers and magazines. Through them I lived in the world, though I was not of it.

I felt very keenly then, and I feel just as keenly now, the great inequality as citizens between women of leisure and the domestic baby-tending kind like myself. A "man's a man for a' that," but a woman's influence in the world depends largely upon circumstances and her husband's income. And that is the reason I want to vote. I cannot leave my bean-fanning, and my bread-baking, and my load of family cares, to go about investigating large things, but by taking a little drive over to the school house once a year I can drop a ballot in the box and be somebody in the State.

As to Miss Tarbell's idea that the ballot is improper and unsafe for ladies, I know the reason. She is a student, an investigator, a speaker, a public person. She is learned and in a way powerful, and she knows this as well as anyone. She fells that, in such capable hands as her own, public influence may not be abused, but to entrust power in the shape of the ballot to bean-fanning and bread-mixing hands would throw the owners of those hands quite off their mental equilibrium. They are, in short, not smart enough.

Too bad, too bad, but we will learn and so will she.

CITY ENGINEER AT ALBANY

Engineer Hill Commissioned to Ask Permit to Cross State Land

City Engineer Hill was commissioned by the Board of Public Works to go to Albany today and secure a permit to cross the state land along the old canal bed with the new storm sewer system. By this action the Board virtually showed its intention of running the new storm sewer across the canal bed at Ontario st. and thence along the west side of the canal bank into the Hunter tail-race at Hubbard st. Although the city wrote for a permit some time ago, it was announced last night that the permit had not been received, so it was decided that the only way to insure the securing of the permit immediately would be to send some one after it and Mr. Hill was selected. He was accompanied to Albany this morning by Contractor Rosoff who also has some business to transact at the Capitol.

The sewer contract has been let to Frank Massaro, but as yet, even the City Engineer does not know where the sewer is to empty, as it is almost a foregone conclusion that the Hunter company will refuse to allow the sewer to dump into its tail-race. Attorney Fanning has advised that the city has a right to run the sewer into the tail-race at a street crossing but the only available crossing is directly at the Hunter fire intake pump and it is certain that the Hunter people will vigorously oppose that action.

Property owners around the intersection of Buffalo and 5th. sts. presented o petition signed by 50 of their number asking the Board to remove the hummocks in the middle of the cross road there and to deposit the dirt on both streets so as to remove the grade at that point. At present the road middle is higher than the sidewalk and after every heavy rain the cellars in trat vicinity are filled with water. The petition showed how the work could be done with but little cost and the Board took the matter under consideration but did not announce its decision.

E. O. Baker and Isaac Alderman appeared before the Board and asked for sidewalks, The Board offered to give the men a grade but stated that it would not be able to pay for the walks as there was no money in the public works fund except some $800 and the superintendent's salary must be paid.

Chief Dyer of the police, was called before the Board and asked to notify all drivers of dump wagons that they must close the tail boards of their wagons before they go out upon the streets. Scavengers and ashmen are also to be warned. President Stevenson announced that the street cleaning department had taken particular pains to clean the streets of the city in good shape Sunday morning, but that the work had hardly been finished before the streets were full of loose paper in the downtown section, most of which is deposited on the streets by the newsboys who carry the Sunday papers. Chief of Police Dyer will arrest any offender in this regard in the future.

The Board received a letter from the State in which it is alleged that there is a deposit on the bed of the canal under the Broadway bridge which will have to be dragged up, and the state calims that the deposit comes from the city's storm sewers. Superintendent Rumsey investigated and took a sample of the deposit and it is entirely pulp and waste from the paper mill at that point. The state wrote two days dredging at that point will be necessary but as the city can prove itself blameless, action will probaby be taken against the paper company.

Property owners who have poplar trees on their grounds are warned to cut them down as the poplars are interfering with the sewers all over the city. The roots of this tree run to water and it works havoc with the pipes.

It was decided that the new bridge on North 1st st. shoul be built of reinforced concrete. Some of the members of the Board were in favor of building a cheaper bridge, claiming that the Board was being criticised for every action that cost some money, but the concrete adherents were in the majority. The girders will be purchased second-hand at a cost of $15 a ton and the concrete and re-inforcing work will bring the total cost of the bridge to $400. The road-way will be 32 by 26 feet and work will be started on the structure some time next week.

There was to have been held last week the annual meeting of the Fulton Yacht Club, but owing to the unavoidable absence of many members the meeting was postponed. Tonight is the time set for the meeting for the purpose of electing officers for the ensuing year, and the City Hall is the place.

BINGHAMTON HAS TREE CENSUS

College of Forestry Will Extend System Throughout State, Employing Pupils

Arrangements have just been completed between the authorities who have in charge the public parks and public schools of the city of Binghamton and the New York State College of Forestry at Syracuse University for the making of a complete shade tree census of Binghamton. The work is outlined and the necessary material and instructions are furnished by the State College of Forestry in such a way as to make the field work of distinct educational value to the pupils in the public high schools. The information gathered will be used in the preparation of a shade tree map for Binghamton. It is the plan of the New York State College of Forestry at Syracuse to extend this census taking of street trees by high school pupils throughout the State as rapidly as possible. This work by the pupils will, in many cities of the State, be the beginning of the proper planting and preservation of public shade trees.

At this season of the year many inquiries are being received by the New York State College of Forestry at Syracuse concerning shade tree planting. Many people are planning with the opening of spring to plant shade and ornamental trees and everyone is desirous of securing the best possible results. If a few points are considered carefully, good results will usually follow tree planting at this season o fthe year. A shade tree grown in a nursery where it has been given good cultural care is always in much better condition for transplanting than a tree grown naturally in the fields or the woods. For general planting, a tree 10 to 12 feet in height is the best size to use. If special care is given much larger trees may be used with success but the cost of the tree and the amount of necessary care increases rapidly as the tree goes above the size suggested above. All trees usedf ror street planting should have straight stems and well branched crows with the lowest branch not less than 7 feet from the ground. Rich garden loam and plenty of it should be furnished so that the tree can make a good healthy growth from the very start. Manure, unless thoroughly decomposed, should not be mixed with the soil in planting. Great care should be taken with the roots of the trees so that in transit or during planting operations they are not exposed to air or sun so as to thoroughly dry out. Street trees after planting should be protected with strong wooden sticks to hold the trees in upright position for the first year or two.

COMMISSION GOVERNMENT ADVANTAGES POINTED OUT

Commission Form of Government was the subject of a speech made last night in Auburn by former State treasurer, J. P. Jaeckel.

The speaker said that people were awakening to the fact that partisan bigotry was the curse of municipal government. He contended that no matter which party was in power, about half of the people were dissatisfied purely from party interests and in reality, the mayor was executive over only part of the people.

Mr. Jaeckel claimed the administration was always handicapped no matter how honest and efficient it might be because some provision must be made for the ones who placed the administration in power.

Mr. Jaeckel divided the voters into five classes: Those who did not care which way election goes; those who criticise every action of the party in power, whether it be conservative or progressive; voters who want to be on the winning side; independents or the goody goody voter, who is too good to associate with and rub elbows with the proletariat and the partisan who votes his party ticket year after year irrespective of whether his nominee is the best man or not.

The cure for this is the commission form of government, according to the speaker. The administration of the affairs of a city, he said, was purely a business proposition and should be taken out of politics.

LOCAL FIRM LOST IN BIDDING

Syracuse Contractor Awarded Oswego Contracts; Fulton Firm's Prices Lowest.

DeBarber & Hill, and Connors & Hartnett of this city were unsuccessful bidders in the contest for contracts for resurfacing certain Oswego city streets.

Samuel Bonn of Syracuse, secured the contract for resurfacing and J. A. Culkin, for placing the pavement in Erie street, Oswego.

DeBarber & Hall, of Fulton, presented a bid about $170 lower than Mr. Culkin, but Commissioner of Works Linsley announced today that he believed it would be better for the interest of the city to give the contract to Mr. Culkin.

The Pathfinder Construction Company of Fulton, (Connors & Hartnett) was fourth. Guy Dickenson, Syracuse, was third.

The bids for Erie street were as follows: DeBarber & Hall, Fulton, $13,318.10; J. A. Culkin, $13,458.25; Guy B. Dickenson, $13,763.75; Pathfinder Construction Company, $13,322.50; John F. Ratigan, $13,530.50; Peter Raby, $14,733; Samuel Bonn, Bonn, $14,599.85.

The above bids were for paving for the street in its entirety from curb to curb, including the railroad tracks, about nine feet. This strip the railroad company will take care of in its own way. If that strip were eliminated from the consideration Mr. Linsley says the firm of DeBarber & Hall submitted the lowest bid, and Mr. Culkin second lowest, elieving that the latter will rush the work to completion without any delay he has decided, he says, that it will be for the best interest of the city to award him the job.

The figures of Mr. Bonn on the resurfacing are as follows; West Second, Bridge to Oneida, 4,117.21; West Second, Oneida to Mohawk and West in Mohawk to Fourth, $6,822; West Oneida, Second to Fifth, $7, 409.50.

Rough on Rosebery.

Lord Rosebery has all his life been a wonderful orator, and he has probably made as many speeches as any politician living. He has told an amusing story against himself about a certain proofreader who, after he had read the proof of a particularly long speech of his lordship's, wrote at the end of it the words, "Thank heaven!"

The proof was duly returned to the printer, who set up these words in type. The next day the speech was published in the newspaper with the following startling ending: "At the conclusion of his speech Lord Rosebery left for the south. Thank heaven!"—London Tit-Bits.

Souvenirs Are Valuable.

London.—Pieces of German shells dropped in December raids at West Hartlepool are so valuable as souvenirs a bricklayer and a real estate agent had a lawsuit over a fragment weighing forty-seven pounds. They value it at £2 a pound. The bricklayer claimed it because he saw it first, the other said because it hit the house of a client, and the latter got it.

Life Insurance.

It is secretly and by stealth, and also with trepidation, that a man goes about the business of insuring his life. Intuition tells him that his wife, if he gave her his confidence, denounce the project and be grieved by it; and for his own part, he cannot help shrinking at the thought of the steps that it demands. He contemplates the annual or semiannual payment that the engagement imposes on him with less concern than offering himself to the medical examiner for approval or rejection. Unaware of any serious physical disabilities, he yet does not know what fatal defects the skilled investigator may discover; and if he has indeed only a precarious hold upon life, he would much rather not be told of it.

But the persuasions of the life-insurance agent and his own uneasy conscience, which reminds him that he has not made provision for his family in the event of his untimely demise, prevail over his apprehension, and he presents himself for medical inspection. Let us assume that he finds it a less fearful ordeal than he had anticipated, and that the doctor, instead of looking grave and keeping an ominous silence, congratulates him on his large chest expansion and vigorous heart action—gives him, in short a clean bill of health. He emerges from the interview a happy man, in a glow of kindliness for all the world and of particular esteem for himself. It has been, he thinks, worth his while to be thoroughly overhauled by a physician, if only to be told that he is all right; otherwise, he might have done a lot of needless worrying about his health. Now he need never give it a moment's thought. What a blessing! Also, the consciousness that he has done his duty by his family is elevating; feeling that he need no longer have a secret from his wife, and hopefully expectant of praise and gratitude, he goes home and tells her what he has done.

Perhaps she rewards him as he anticipates; but it is quite as likely that she will be distressed and disturbed, and feel that he would never have insured his life if he had not been going to die. Even after he has striven to remove this conviction from her mind, she will probably declare that the idea of life insurance is revolting to her; that she does not want to be financially compensated for his death, and that she wishes he had arranged to make some other use of his savings.

But this disconcerting attitude changes in time, and the wife as well as the husband comes to recognize the importance of life insurance. Just what proportion of savings should be invested in it is a question that each man must decide for himself, but that some proportion should be so applied is desirable in the case of almost everyone. The virtue of sacrifice is united to that of thrift, and the home that is the man's pride rests upon a more secure foundation.—Youth's Companion.

ALBANY LETTER DAY BY DAY

By FREDERIC T. CARDOZE

Albany, April 13.—Diplomatically calling attention to the fact that the cities of the State are overpopulated in comparison to the farming districts, the State department of agriculture has prepared interesting data to bear out this contention.

According to figures recently gathered the State department of Agriculture finds that New York State has a population of nearly ten millions of people, or one tenth of the population of the United States. Of this number nearly eight millions reside in the fifty-two cities and the four hundred and sixty-five incorporated villages.

"If this enormous nmber of non-food producing people is to secure its food-stuffs from their natural sources it is the imperative duty of this department, as well as of every agricultural agency in the State to encourage and stimulate agricultural production to the fullest extent," says o recent bulletin issued by the Agricultural department.

It is unldoubtedly true that a considerable area of land now included in the farms of the State should have been allowed to remain in forest, as at the time of clearing there was sufficient land, had it been properly worked, to supply the population of the State with all needed agricultural products. In this rough, sterile soil, denuded of timber, included in farms and afterwards neglected, is found all that land included in the term, "abandoned farms."

The State agricultural department holds that there are no abandoned farms in this Stote. There are farms, however, which lack farmers, it is pointed out, but there are no parts of the agricultural lands upon which profitable farming of some kind cannot be done. The production per acre of any of the farm crops in the State is a complete refutation of the assertion, ignorantly stated, that farm lands in New York State are cheap because they are poor or worn out.

It is true that New York State farms are relatively cheap, the department of Agriculture admits. Divers reasons are given for this condition. The passage by Congress of the "Homestead" act, drew many farmers from this State to the west. The call of the city is another cause. The prosperity of the large farm owner has caused him to become a city dweller himself, leaving his farm lands in less capable hands. Other reasons assigned are that the competion of the west has lessened the value of the farm lands of the east; the disinclination of th youngr generation to remain on the farm, has sadly decreased the population of the rural districts.

The department of Agriculture points out further that New York farms today offer unequalled opportunities to the farmer who is in the farming business, to make money. New York morkets are the best, since transportation by water, steam or electrical agencies, is approached by no other State. Moreover, New York highways furnish the last and most necessary link to connect the farm with the consumer.

In spite of these facts there are in almost every county in the State farm lands for sale or for rent and moreover, this condition has existed for years. There are in fact, over thirteen hundred farms, large and small, which can be purchased by the payment of part cash in practically any county from Albany to Yates.

The Trustees of Auburn Theological Seminary have sold property in Hannibal to Harry B. Dopp for $1,250.

William W. Davis has sold Fulton property to Harvey E. Hewitt for $3,400.

An order permitting the sale of real estate to pay the debts of Charles H. Baker, a veteran of the Civil War, was issued yesterday by Judge Coville. It authorizes the committee, David S. Stone of Oswego, to sell certain real property on the west side owned by Mr. Baker, to pay the claim of Mary E. Allen for board and lodging amounting to $2,150, and other claims Mr. Baker is now an inmate of the Soldiers' Home and has pension which supports him.

RENTS MOUNT VERY HIGH

Large Sums Paid by State for Office Rentals Would Provide a Building

Albany, April 13.—Executive Auditor George A. Glynn and William A. Orr, secretary to Governor Whitman have been looking into the matters of rents paid by the state and office furniture used by state dapartments and their findings are highly interesting.

The executor auditor finds that the state has approximately 125 landlords with the rents of 1915 aggregating nearly $325,000, that department requests for furniture total $125,000 and that corporations are buying supplies at lower prices than the State.

In New York city there are more than thirty offices occupied by State departments and in some of the upstate cities there are as many as eight.

The auditor finds that if offices were consolidated in cities it would make a saving not only in rental but in payroll as the present diversity of offices requires an unnecessarily large number of employes.

New York city rentals amount to nearly $150,000 and Albany rentals to over $75,000, more than sufficient to pay the interest charges on sums sufficient to erect state office buildings.

Secretary Orr finds that state departments are evading the law which requires them to purchase furniture from the state prisons. Under this head he says: "Progressing by easy stages, the custom has finally arrived, within the last year, to a point where [illegible] trustees of public buildings granted, in the most casual fashion, permission for the designing of special furniture not only for the offices of department heads, but for general office purposes throughout the departments."

The report goes on to cite the case of the state board of tax commissioners which had the state architect prepare special designs for furniture for its new offices in the capitol with this comment: "The requests for furniture made by that department to the state architect indicated that there was someone employed in that department who might have been employed as a special furniture designer for museums than in the capacity of a tax expert. The designs and specifications when completed called for the installation of "crotch mahogany" furniture which was of the most expensive material and style that could be asked for. Furniture experts throughout the country who wrote me when that matter came before the present board of trustees assured me that while it was undoubtedly the most expensive furniture that could be asked for it was, at the same time, the most useless for working purposes."

As a result of his investigation Secretary Orr and State Architect Pilcher took up with the prison authorities the question of having the prisons turn out furniture of a better quality and more finished style and it was decided to put the matter in the hands of warden Osborn at Sing Sing with the idea that he would work it out through the mutual welfare league. The prisoners at Sing Sing are working on a complete set of library tables and chairs for the new legislative library in the capitol. The manufacture in the prisons of this higher grade of furniture will enormously reduce the State's large annual bill for office furniture.

In order to regulate and systematize these governmental activities, the trustees of public buildings have drawn a bill now pending in the legislature which gives that board sole authority in the leasing of premises for the state for office purposes and for the purchase of furniture and equipment.

Under this measure it would be possible to combine office to some extent, to pass upon the needs of departments for furniture and supplies, to hold for the manufacturing department of the prisons the trade which the law gives it and to obtain prices for supplies as low as they can be purchased by corporations using like quantities.

2 NEW MANAGERS IN EACH TEAM

it will not be because it has not been brought to the top of form of condition by Manager Robinson. O'Mara, the club's sensational shortstop, has practically recovered from the injury to his leg, and in the short field he is sure to prove one of the valuabel members of the club.

The pitching staff of the Dodgers is stronger than last season, and with the batting strength that the club possesses Brooklyn should finish higher up in the race thon at any time during the past few seasons.

Cubs Sure to Be Factor

A club which is sure to be an impotrant factor in the National League race this year is the Chicago Club, with its new manager, Roger Bresnahan. This is not Bresnahan's first managerial experience. He was at the helm in St. Louis a few seasons ago and proved his right to be called a capable manager. Under him, the Cubs have taken a wonderful brace this spring and the experts predict that the Cubs will show something like their former greatness when the race gets under way.

Another new manager in the Nation League is Pat Moran of the Phillies. Radical changes have taken place on the Phillies. Harmony has been restored and Moran has inaugurated a different system of playing. The Phillies, under his guidance, have started in on an era of smart ball playing and the result will be watched with interest.

Phillies Have Good Pitchesr

The short field will have a player in young Bancroft of whom great things are expected. Around Alexander, perhaps the most reliable pitcher in the National League, Moran has built up a strong pitching staff.

Pittsburgh, St. Louis and Cincinnati have all made changes which will be more or less experimental. Much younger playing talent has been brought to the front, all of which will tend to make the season moer ancertain and interesting.

Should Have New Lease on Life

hTe American League will also introduce two new managers in Bill Donovan of the Yankees and Carence Rowland of the White Sox. Under the new conditions of a different ownership the Yankees are expected to take a new leos on life. For the first year, Donovan's experience will be more or less experimental, but even in the preliminary games the Yankee team has shown a more ambitious spirit and willingness to accomplish something more than they did last season.

The Yankees are sure to show improvement, but just how much will not be known until the season is well under way. The pitching staff as it stands rank well with the others in the League. In its defense the Yankee team is all that could be wished, but the weakness, if anywhere, will be in the hitting. The addition of High and Pipp may go a great way

Collins Ought to Help Rowland

In Clarence Rowland, President in bettering this weakness. Momisley of the White Sox has chosen a poung man untried in major league experience. The addition of Eddie Collins to the Sox should prove of inestimable worth. This Cub, too, has great pitching talent, and with the aid of Collins, it s expected by many that the Chicago Americans will be an important factor in the race for the flag.

The Athletics, stripped of so much valent talen as Collins, Baker, Plank, and Bender, is not taken too seriously in calcuating the possibe pennant winner during the present season. Mack will have much rebuilding to do, and it may take a few seasons to bring his young talent up to the Athletics' standard.

They All Pick the Red Sox

The American League team which promises great possibilities this season is the Boston Red Sox. This club made a finish in last year's race that showed that it played better ball than any of the teams of either league It as so late in getting started, however, that all chances for a pennant were lost. It has a pitching staff which is second to none in baseball, and not only that, but it has a hard-hitting infield, which is one of the necessities for a pennant winner. The outfield, with the reliable Tris Speaker as the leading swatsmith,

SCHOOL BOARD LEAVES QUESTION

Chamber of Commerce Will Be Asked to Assist in Determining New School Site

It was learned this morning that the Chamber of Commerce will be asked to take up the matter of a new high school in the near future. The Educational Committee of the Chamber, which will be appointed at the next regular meeting will be petitioned by a representative number of taxpayers to draw up a petition of some sort in regard to the matter, said petition to be presented to the Board of Education. It is definitely stated that the Board of Education is not willing to push the matter further, although all the members of the Board agree that the Seminary site is the best. By a new bill now in the Legislature, which will probably be passed, the Board will be able to act on its own intiative, select a site and buy it without the necessity of a general election. Members of the board, however, feel that this would not be the right and honorable course inasmuch as the Falley proposition has been defeated twice in the past. The Board intends to let the people decid now for themselves, and when this was learned some tax payers, interested in the question of a new high school, decided to take the matter to the Chamber of Commerce.

The option on the Falley site will expire July 1 and, although there seems to be many objections to the site, no other site has been proposed which seems as practical. The terms of payment for the property are most [illegible] and the building now on the land could be used for a short time, at least. The Chomber of Commerce will probably take some action on the question at its next meeting and if the Falley site is not received with favor the Educational Committee will learn what the sentiment of the people is.

Secretary Heydecker of the Chamber of Commerce returned to Fulton yesterday from New York city where he spent a few days in moving his effects to this city. Mr. and Mrs. Heydecker have taken a house in Oneida st.

Ralph Stoddard of the American City Bureau, left the city last night for the New York office, his work here having been completed. Mr. Stoddard will probably go to Charlotte, N. C., in a few days, in the interests of the Bureau. He was in charge of the local office of the Chamber of Commerce here during the absence of Secretary Heydecker and he made many warm friendsd uring his brief stay here. He expects to visit Fulton some time this summer.

TREE DISEASES DUE TO EITHER BACTERIA OR FUNGI

To most people fungi are known only by their occasional fruiting bodies such as mushrooms, toad stools, puff balls, etc. The growing part of the fungue is active night and day just as long as the temperature and moisture conditions are favorable. There are sveeral thousand different kinds of fungi to be found in the State of New Yok and several hundred of them are very common on our trees. Many of the mushroom types are edible but some of them are very poisonous. The greatest interest and value of the study of mushrooms and fungi in the State does not lie in their edible or poisonous qualities, but in the way in which they take part in the life of the forest.

A great many fungi are active agents in the change of vegetable debris into what is commonly called mold or humis. Humis enriches the soil and makes it very productive and it also acts like a sponge in the forest for the holding of water which falls as rain or which comes from melting snow. Millions of feet of valuable timber in New York are annually destroyed or rendered useless by fungi. Many other fungi are active parasites upon living trees causing eventual death in most cases. Much of the diseases and decay in shade and ornamental trees is due directly to fungi.

Some of the fungi of New York State are found in nearly all parts of the world. Others are found only in the temperate regions, while still others do not occur outside of certain limited sections of the State.

The Department of Forest Botany of the New York State College of Forestry at Syracuse is making an extensive study of the forest fungi of the State. During 1914 large collections of fungi were made in the Adirondacks and Catskills as well as in the vicinity of Syracuse. It is planned to continue during the coming season the study of forest fungi already begun by the College and at the same time to investigate carefully the several problems involving the relation of fungi to disease and decay in trees.

Black Knot on Trees

Frequent inquiries are coming to the College of Forestry concerning Black Knot which develops upon the twigs and branches of several of our common trees such as oak, maple and hickory. These black knots give an unslightly appearance to the trees and often cause death to the branches. As a matter of fact, very little is known as to the cause of these knots although probably insects have something to do with their formation. They are not caused by fungi as in the case of many such knots or burls in the pine trees. Neither are they like the common black knot of Cherry and Plum which is caused by a parasitic fungus. The Department of Forest botany in the College of Forestry at Syracuse is making an investigation of these knots or tree tumors. The object of the investigation is to determine the distribution of the trouble, the kins of trees that are affected the loss or injury caused by them, and if possible, methods of prevention. The College will be glad to have specimens of black knots upon all kinds of trees and from different parts of the State. The young or beginning stages of the knot are necessary for the determination of the cause of the trouble. Once the cause is known, a means of controlling it may be determined.

Spray Now for Peach Leaf Curl

Peach leaf curl was very common last year throughout the peach growing sections of the state, and many sprayed orchards were badly affected even when, as was claimed, the application was very thoroughly made. As a result of last year's epidemic of this disease many inquiries have come to the state college of agriculture at Cornell about methods of control during the present year.

The cause of the disease is not the weather, as has been believed by some, but is due, according to the college authorities, to a fungous parasite which lives in the affected parts of the tree. It is supposed that the spores of this fungus are harbored through the winter on the twigs and especially on the hairy bud scales. When the buds swell in the spring, the tender leaves within are exposed and if rain comes at the right time, the spores germinate and penetrate the young leaves where the fungus finds favorable conditions for its development. The spores are produced later in the season on the diseased leaves and probably find their way to the dormant buds where they remain till the following spring.

The three important factors to consider in the control of the disease, the expert say, are time of application, and materials applied. The application should be made before the buds begin to open, because at this time, under favorable weather conditions, the infection takes place.

After this has occurred subsequent applications to prevent the disease this year are useless. Select the first bright warm day for the application. Many persons sprayed too late last year.

The spray material used should come in contact with every bud, for the fungous spores are sticking to the buds and these must be hit by the spray mixture in order to have perfect control. A fine spray under high pressure is most satisfactory. Some failures of last year were due to too much hurry in the application.

The disease is readily controlled by each of several fungicides. Lime-sulfur solution (testing 32° Baume) diluted with water in the proportion of 1 part solution to 8 parts of water, should be used when both San Jose Scale and leaf curl are to be controlled. When scale is not present, the lime-sulfur solution at a dilution of 1 part lime sulfur to 15 parts of water, or bordeaux mixture in the proportion of 5 pounds copper sulfate, 5 pounds of lime, and 50 gallons of water.

Since thorough spraying will absolutely c[illegible]rl, the college says that every peach grower should take steps to prevent its destructiveness [illegible] year.

This is the picture of a small lad who won a prize with his beautiful hunting dog at the recent dog show held at Madison Square Garden, New York city. The dog is named Mallwyd Edward, and he is a pure bred English setter of high degree; otherwise he wouldn't have won a prize in so great an exhibition. The proud boy's name is Bradley West, and he is the son of Mr. West, one of the owners of a well known kennel. Little Bradley was probably the most interested individual at the show. He felt sure that his dog was deserving of a prize and that he should capture the blue ribbon, but he was wise enough to understand that perhaps the judges might not think so highly of Mallwyd Edward as he did. But in this case it turned out that he was right, and the show officials decided that his pet was the best dog in his class. You can be sure Bradley thought the judges were wise men, for didn't they know a fine dog? When the award was announced Bradley was right there, and he hugged his prize winner delightedly. That was the moment when the camera man snapped their pictures.

The Bow and the Gun.

"The modern hunting gun," says Ernest Thompson Seton, "is an irresistible weapon for wholesale murder, and it is just as deadly no matter who pulls the trigger. It spreads terror as well as death by its loud discharge, and it leaves little clew as to who is responsible for the shot. Its deadly range is so fearfully great as to put all game at the mercy of the clumsiest tyro. Woodcraft, the oldest of all defenses and one of the best, has steadily declined since the coming of the gun, and it is entirely due to this same unbridled power that America has lost so many of her fine game animals.

"The bow is a far less destructive weapon, and to succeed at all in the chase the bowman must be a double read forester. The bow is silent, and it sends the arrow with exactly the same power that the bowman's arm puts into it—no more, no less—so it is really his own power that speeds the arrow.

"There is no question as to which hunter has the right to the game or is responsible for the shot when the arrow is there to tell. The gun stands for little skill, irresistible force supplied from an outside force, overwhelmingly unfair odds and sure death to the victim. The bow, on the other hand, stands for all that is clever and fine in woodcraft, so no guns or firearms of any kind are allowed in our boy scout camp."

Looked Bad For Papa.

William's uncle was a very tall, fine looking man, while his father was very small. William admired his uncle and wished to grow up like him. One day he said to his mother:

"Mama, how did uncle grow so big and tall?"

His mother said, "Well, when uncle was a small boy he was always a very good boy and tried to do what was right at all times, so God let him grow up big and tall."

William thought this over seriously for a few minutes, then said, "Mama, what kind of a boy was papa?"—Pittsburgh Post.

Striking a Match In Wind.

Kephart in his book on "Camping and Woodcraft" says: "When there is nothing to strike it on jerk the head of the match forward through the teeth, or face the wind. Cup your hands back toward the wind, remove the right hand just long enough to strike the match on something very close by, then instantly resume former position. The flame of the match will run up the stick instead of blowing away from it.

"Change Seats."

As many seats as players save one. He who has no seat stands in the center, repeating the words, "Change seats," "change seats." All are on the alert to observe when he adds, "The king's come," when all change seats, and he must try to get one. If he should say, "The king has not come," the seats must be kept.

To Lullaby Town.

Betty is starting for Lullaby Town.
Sweet is the music she hears on the way—
Ready for lullabies, tired of play,
Soft is her carriage; on rockers it goes,
As grandmother counts all the pink little toes.

Each little toe in a vision she'll see.
Safe on her journey on grandmother's knee
"This is a robin asleep in a tree;
This is a butterfly; this is a bee;
This is a pig with a lovely pink nose;
And this last little one is a tiny white rose."

Ready for bed in her long white nightgown,
Safely goes Betty to Lullaby Town.
Soft is her carriage; on rockers it goes
As grandmother counts all the dear little toes.
Each one as soft and as pink as a rose.

BLOUSE AND SKIRT.

The skirt and blouse shown here is a combination which is extremely practical for all but formal occasions. The separate skirt of covert can be worn throughout the summer with blouses of silk or linen or lawn. This skirt is a plain circular one with a belt attached and trimmed with ball buttons.

Suit Case Sewing Room.

For a woman living in a small apartment, or a home that is not large enough to include a sewing room, an excellent substitute for a sewing room—not a sewing basket—is an inexpensive Japanese suit case. The bag fastened to the inside of the cover (for shirts) is a splendid place to keep paper patterns, scraps of cloth, written lists of little things required on the next shopping tour, etc. The other part, of course, is for the sewing. A cushion can be attached to the side for pins and needles; also a box containing thread, scissors, tape measure, tailor's chalk, lead pencil, thimble, etc. Such a suit case is large enough to contain practically all that one needs in sewing. Furthermore, it looks neater when closed than a box of the same size would, is much more durable and is easily carried from one room to another, or kept by the side of the machine.

A Triangular Race

By F. A. MITCHEL

It was a bright spring morning, when one feels like breathing in the fresh air and stretching one's legs. I determined on a long walk before luncheon and started with that end in view. On passing the Stanleys' place I saw Helen coming out dressed in morning costume, with a short skirt and boots. Waiting till she reached the gate, I joined her. Comparing notes, we learned that we were both out for the same purpose. We joined forces.

We had gone but a short distance when Tom Bartlett struck us square in the flank from a side street.

"We're going for a tramp into the country," said Helen to Tom. "Come along."

"Thanks awfully," said Tom, looking at me doubtfully. "They say that two's company, three's a crowd.'

"Not a bit of it—the more the merrier," said Helen.

Now, there is a lot more in this than appears on the surface. Bartlett and I were rivals for Miss Stanley's affections. We believed that she was hesitating between the two of us. I had been trying to get her to come to a decision, and I presume Tom had been trying to do the same thing. Tom joined us, but was too much of a gentleman to intrude himself for the walk without some hint from me that I would not object. Reaching a corner, he lifted his hat with a view to leaving us, when I said:

"You have your orders from the lady, Tom; it is your duty to obey them."

I saw mischief, design, deviltry, in Helen's eyes, but nothing that I could define. When we reached the open country she drew long breaths of ozone into her lungs and said with exhilaration:

"I feel as though I must run."

"So do I," said Tom. "Come on."

We ran abreast for several hundred yards, then dropped into a walk again.

"I wonder," said Bartlett, "why more decisions are not arrived at by race than by lot."

"They have a custom in Lapland," said Helen, "wherein if a man wishes to marry a girl he chases her. If she accepts him she permits him to catch her; if she refuses she runs for all she is worth."

What put it into my head to make my next remark I know not.

"If two fellows in Lapland want the same girl," I said, "do they race for her?"

"I never heard anything about that," said Helen.

Looking sidewise into her eye, I saw a spark in it that told much more than her words. It started a flame within me that burned recklessly. But I held back for some time before showing it. After awhile Helen said she was pining for another run.

"Suppose," I said deliberately. I stopped.

"Suppose what?" asked Helen.

"Suppose that you take 500 yards start for a race. And suppose that Tom and I separate so that each of the three of us stands on the angle of a triangle. Then suppose you run for it and Tom and I try which can touch you first."

Helen said never a word, but I saw by that spark in her eye that she caught my meaning.

"Is it a go, Tom?" I asked.

"I'm agreed if the lady is."

"I don't mind," said Helen under her breath.

"Very well; Tom, you stay here. I go to that stump over there. Suppose you," I said to Helen, "advance to that lone tree in the center of the field."

Helen and I started, leaving Tom where he was. To equalize advantage between Tom and me she must run on a straight line perpendicular to the base line of the angles on which Tom and I stood. I doubted if she would do this. It would be human nature for her to veer toward the man she wished to win. I don't mean that the race would be an acceptance of the winner, but it would show a preference for him over the other.

When our positions were taken Helen turned and looked at us. It was evident she was laying out the course she should pursue. Then she called, "Are you ready?" and on our response that we were she turned and dashed away.

There was plenty of room for the race, for the field stretched a long way, with but one fence in sight, and that was open at many places. I was by far a better runner than Bartlett, who was a studious chap and seldom took exercise. I had no desire to win the race unless Helen gave me an opportunity; therefore I ran on a dog trot. Bartlett ran on much the same gait. For a time Helen kept on the perpendicular line; then, coming to a bit of boggy ground, she was obliged to decide whether she would go to the right or to the left of it. She went as far as she could before deciding; then zigzagged with apparent indecision, finally turning to the left, which shortened my line.

The moment she made her decision I closed up on her and touched her on the shoulder. Turning to look at Tom I saw that he had dropped into a walk. Poor fellow! He had put the same interpretation on the race as I.

The result closed [illegible] veen Tom and me, but d[illegible] y fate. I was held in sus[illegible] some time longer before I received my answer, but when it came it was satisfactory.

A MEXICAN MARRIAGE GIFT

Being a Story of Second-hand Furniture.

By F. A. MITCHEL

We have become so used to our own marriage customs that we do not realize that all over the world these customs vary. In Europe a prevailing requirement is that the bride shall furnish a dowry, even among the lower classes. In Russia there are a number of singular customs, the most unique of which is that a woman desiring to marry a man may go to his house and remain there till he marries her. If he puts her out her relatives will avenge the act as an insult. In northern Italy the matter of marriage is largely in the hands of brokers, but after an engagement is broken the man must pay all damages. In Japan a marriage may be contracted for a limited period, the man paying down a specified sum, which goes to the bride's parents.

In Mexico they have a custom different from any of these. The man pays all the wedding expenses, including a trousseau for the bride. He provides the wedding feast, with plenty of wine. The most expensive part of his outlay is furnishing the home.

Pepita Sierra, a Spanish girl of Mexico City, was a coquette. She was very pretty, with her olive and red complexion and long Spanish lashes, which, when she dropped them over her flaming dark eyes before the admiring gaze of a man, rendered her very attractive. When she was fifteen—a marriageable age in Mexico—she was wooed by Leandro Ortez, a wealthy man twenty years her senior, and, since he was well off, her father accepted him for her. She had never had a lover and was not averse to the [illegible] her own age, whom she liked better. The wedding outfit had been provided by her fiance, and the ceremony was to take place in a few days. But this did not prevent Pepita from breaking off the match. Ortez had provided the trousseau and the furniture. Being a gentleman descended from a Spanish grandee, he declined to take back the trousseau and insisted also on Pepita's retaining the furniture. Pepita's father protested against this, but Ortez overcame his scruples, and the senorita found herself in possession of all the fine clothes she would need for some time and a large storeroom filled with elegant furniture.

She did not succeed in catching the young man who had caused the break between her and Ortez, so the outfit was not used. She wore the clothes that had been provided until the fashions changed, then gave them to the poor, but the furniture remained in storage.

Pepita, though she had many minor affairs of the heart, did not become engaged again till she was twenty; then she was betrothed to Joaquin Molina. This time she was very much in love. Molina, who was full of romance, told her that he had never loved and never could love any one but her. Of course Pepita responded that she had never loved any one but him. All went pleasantly between the pair until the wedding day was set. Then Joaquin told his fiancee that they would better set a day when they would go together and select the furniture for their home.

By this time Pepita had grown clean out of childhood and had begun to look to the pecuniary requirements of life. Her fiance was not wealthy, and her father could do very little for her in the way of dowry. There was plenty of furniture in storage that needed only to be brought forth and placed in the house the couple would occupy. Pepita would not be averse to this. Women are accustomed to receive gifts, and she had no compunction as to using what had been provided by one lover in establishing a home with another. But what would Senor Molina say to doing so?

Molina was very sensitive. If she told him that she possessed furniture that had been given her by one whom she had expected to marry it would bring up a matter that might have an unpleasant effect on her present lover. On the other hand, Molina could not afford—so she believed—to provide such handsome furniture as that already possessed, and why should money be thus wasted?

She tried hard to bring herself to broach the matter to Molina, but dared not do so. Then it occurred to her to sell what furniture had been provided, turning it into money. She made inquiries as to what she could get for it and was surprised to find that although it was as good as new it must be sold for secondhand furniture and would not bring 20 per cent of cost.

Pepita would not have been a woman if she could have consented to this sacrifice. What a pity that men were so averse to using anything as a husband that had been provided by a former lover of his wife's! If she could arrange to utilize the furniture a few years after marriage, when their love had become more practical, the difficulty might be overcome. But between lovers on the eve of marriage, when there was so much sentiment involved, a spark might blow the whole affair sky high.

Nevertheless Senorita Sierra followed a course to which women are much given. A man would probably have sacrificed the furniture rather than risk breaking off the match. Pepita took the risk of losing the man she loved rather than sacrifice the furniture. After a long debate with herself and much effort in screwing up her courage she introduced the subject to Molina, choosing one evening when they were together alone enjoying some viands of especial delicacy and a bottle of wine. When her lover had eaten the former and drunk the latter Pepita, drawing his arm around her waist and leaning her head on his breast, said:

"Joaquin, dear."

"What, sweetheart?"

"I've been thinking that I should do something to relieve the strain that you will have to bear in providing for our wedding."

"Don't worry about that, dear. I can handle the matter."

"But there is one large item of expense—the largest item—that is really not necessary you should incur."

"What is that, pet?"

"Why, in the matter of furniture."

"The furniture?"

"Yes. I have some very nice furniture that will make us very comfortable."

"You have?"

"Yes—that is, if you would act sensibly about using furniture that was provided"—

She was stalled.

"Provided how?"

"It was bought at a time when"—

"When"—

"Did I ever tell you that when I was a child I was engaged to marry"—

"What!"

"A man a great deal older than myself. He was old enough to be my father."

"Do you mean to tell me that you had been engaged before giving yourself to me?"

He had drawn away from her and was looking at her with a cold stare.

"Haven't I ever mentioned it before?"

"Mentioned it! No! You told me that I was the only man you ever loved."

"Did I?"

"Yes, and now you tell me that you have been engaged before."

There was an awful pause between them which Joaquin broke.

"What has this to do with the furniture?" he asked.

"Why, it was provided—provided by the man to whom"—

"Heavens! What an awful deception! I can never excuse it—never, never, never!"

He buried his face in his hands.

"Joaquin, dear, why do you set so much store by something that happened ever so long ago, when I was a mere chit and knew nothing of love?"

"Knew nothing of love! Were you going to marry a man you didn't love?"

"I thought I did."

"How did you find out that you didn't?"

Here was another stumper. Pepita did not reply.

"Come! Confess all since you are about it."

After a long silence the rest came out haltingly.

"I was young and giddy. A man about my own age attracted me, and—I broke with the other."

"Oh, you really fell in love this time?"

No answer.

"Well, what became of this second love affair?"

"It didn't come to anything."

"Why not?"

There was a terrible temptation to lie, but Pepita was a good girl and would not lie even to retain the man she loved.

"He didn't fancy me."

Instead of appreciating Pepita's honesty Joaquin went off into a passionate tirade about having been deceived. He rose while venting his spleen and, with a wave of the hand and a formal bow, said:

"All is over between us!"

Then he swept out of the room.

Pepita was not crushed. She followed him with her eyes in a sort of wonder, while within her was breaking a revolution as real as that in her lover was emotional. His unreasonableness, his injustice, stood out in contrast with the generosity of Leandro Ortez, who had refused to hold her or to blame her when he learned that she had given her heart to another, but had insisted on her keeping all his gifts.

When Joaquin's outburst had subsided it began to dawn upon him that he had made a fool of himself. He passed the next day in indecision and in the evening, having repented, went to Pepita for a reconciliation. He received word by a servant that Senorita Sierra was engaged. He turned away with a cry of anguish.

Senor Ortez had never married. He had given his heart to Pepita when she was little more than a child, and she still held it as a woman.

There is a celebration in Mexico City called the battle of flowers. When the next anniversary of this fete came round after Senorita Sierra broke with Joaquin Molina she was riding within a line of carriages in the Chapultepec park meeting another line of carriages, while persons in both lines were pelting each other with roses. Suddenly Pepita caught sight of Leandro Ortez coming. As he passed he was struck in the face with a rose. Looking at his assailant, he saw Pepita smiling at him.

Ortez considered the rose and the smile a recall. The same evening he saw Pepita and their engagement was renewed.

Within a short time after the new engagement the furniture that had been the means of its donor's recall was sold and the house in which the couple began their married life was provided with an entirely new outfit.

"Miss Fix It"

The Up to Date Girl.

By ELSIE V. H. BALDWIN

Copyright by Frank A. Munsey Co.

"Congratulations!" said Mr. Harris, strolling into the office of John Tyler, the lawyer.

"Thanks," replied his friend laconically, trying not to look self conscious.

"Never thought you'd do it, John," continued Mr. Harris. "Everybody gave you up as a hopeless bach long ago; but, come to think of it, this rather suits my convenience, because you're probably feeling rather more lenient with the frailer sex just now, and I want you to take a little girl in your office who needs a job."

"Can't do it," objected Mr. Tyler, looking greatly alarmed at the idea. "Sorry, Harris, but I simply can't."

"Come, now, Tyler," urged Mr. Harris. "She's a nice little thing—old man Parker's girl, and she needs the money. She's my wife's cousin, too, and"—

"No, sir," interrupted Mr. Tyler emphatically, jerking his glasses off in his excitement and nervously swinging them on their black string. "No women in this office! Never! Never again!"

"Why not?" inquired Mr. Harris anxiously.

"Well, it's too long a story to tell the whole of it, but I'll give you a brief synopsis of it.

"You see"—he settled himself down for the narration—"we had an advertisement in the paper. 'Wanted—Lady to take charge of correspondence file in law office. Good looks no recommendation,' or something like that. About two dozen answered it. Most of them didn't seem to have noticed that we said 'lady.' They all looked alike, and I couldn't see that one was better looking or knew any more than another, so I just shut my eyes a second and pointed my finger, and when I opened them again I had picked her out. Blake, her name was—Susie Blake.

"She wasn't bad looking as girls go—kind of slight and yellow haired. Pretty, I guess you'd have called her. And sort of languid, as though she'd faint away at the sound of a cuss word.

"To tell the truth, though," he hastened to remark, "I didn't pay much attention to her. I was pretty busy with the Reyburn case then and hadn't time to think of anything else much.

"But one morning when she'd been here about a week"—Mr. Tyler's memory for dates was quite remarkable in so busy a man—"she came into my room with some papers I'd called for, and while I was looking them over she said, 'Mr. Tyler, there is something I'd like to ask you.'

"'Ask away,' I said, or something to that effect, wondering all the time whether she was going to touch me for an advance on her salary.

"'I'm always here by half past 8, but I was going to suggest that the office boy should come promptly at 9, so that I could refer the letters around before the men get here. It ought to be fixed.'

"Well, of course I fixed it, though I couldn't remember ever having been told before what 'ought to be' done in my office by a woman. I thought it wouldn't hurt to humor her and that a lecture for the office boy would be the end of the matter.

"But no, indeed! I hadn't more than but just forgotten all about it when she sailed in again to see me.

"'Mr. Tyler'—she always began with my name, as though she thought I was in imminent danger of forgetting who I was—'I've been looking over the files very carefully,' she said, 'and your system is all wrong.'

"'Indeed,' I assured her, 'it isn't my system. But what's wrong with it anyway?'

"'The numbering system should be used, and in addition you should have a vertical steel file, and the papers should be laid out flat, and'—

"'Enough,' I said. 'Let it go at that. Take it out.'

"So it was taken out, and a brand new green and gold steel arrangement was brought in and a whole lot of the cards and a case to hold them, and Miss Blake was happy."

"Well," inquired Mr. Harris as his friend paused to get his breath, "was the system any good?"

"Yes, indeed," replied the lawyer heartily, "it was a grand system, I'll admit. You could find anything, from the papers for a divorce case to the latest letter from Brennan to Miss Blake. Oh, yes, all the men were crazy about her. They called her 'Miss Fix It' behind her back, but you bet they fell all over themselves dancing attendance on her. And she was pretty," ruminated Mr. Tyler in an absentminded manner, while a fatuous smile spread slowly over his features.

"We had some peace for awhile," he continued, visibly recalling himself from a brown study, "but just as I was thinking to myself that she seemed to be really quite efficient for a girl she presented another one of those fateful requests.

"She came into my room after lunch with a bunch of sweet peas in her hand and laid them on my desk. 'I thought you might share these with me,' she said. 'They freshen the place up so, and it's so dreadfully hot.' I took them. You can't hurt a girl's feelings. And, just by way of returning the attention and half as a joke, I said, 'Now, what can I do for you?'

"She hesitated, as though she could not quite make up her mind which of a hundred and sixteen things to ask for, and finally she picked out the one hundred and seventeenth.

"'Would you—wouldn't you order some flower boxes to be put in the office windows and let me plant some flowers in them?'

"Confound it all, I didn't want my offices turned into a florist's shop, but I'd brought the thing on myself by accepting her miserable sweet peas and by asking to do something for her like a driveling idiot, so I had to consent and do it with a good grace too. However, that venture wasn't as bad as it might have been, because we got quite a reputation from those window boxes."

"Well, old man," remarked Mr. Harris encouragingly, "it is a nuisance to have a woman messing around a place of business, but your Miss Blake doesn't seem to have done very much damage."

"No," admitted Mr. Tyler slowly, "but then," he added, cheering up a little, "you haven't heard all of it yet. That's a small part of it.

"There's the time she jumped on Brennan. Brennan's a mighty smart chap and a good, solid, reliable sort of fellow, but he's also very grouchy.

"Well, one day she went in to speak to him about some papers and found him sitting in his usual position, with his hat on the back of his head and his feet on his desk and staring vacantly out of the window. Miss Blake began explaining the points, but Brennan went right on looking out on the street and apparently not paying the slightest attention to her. She kept it up a second or two and then she stopped. At first Brennan didn't notice that she had stopped, but when it dawned on him that she was standing there looking at him hard enough to bore a hole in his back he jumped around in his chair like lightning, and to do that he had to remove his feet from the desk.

"'Now that I have your attention,' said Miss Blake, 'I will ask you to remove your hat.' Oh, my," cried Mr. Tyler, slapping his knee with great enjoyment, "I'd love to have seen Brennan's face! I guess he never had been spoken to that way before. However he may have felt about it, though, he took his hat off and listened while she explained the business all over again straight through to the bitter end.

"It was just about this time that Watkins took to staying at the office after 5 o'clock. I thought there must be something up, because in all the five years or more he has worked for me I have never before known him to do such a thing. I happened to stay late myself one evening and caught him, and he looked as guilty as though he had been getting into the safe.

"Miss Blake was in her room, up in passing through I asked her why Watkins was staying that night.

"'I couldn't say, Mr. Tyler,' she said as demure as you please, 'unless he's getting up material for a divorce case.'

"I was halfway home before it dawned on me what she meant. Everybody that knows Watkins knows that his old lady is as jealous as you make them and threatens him with a suit for divorce every time he looks at a hosiery advertisement. But, you may take my word for it, Miss Blake wasn't bothering about Watkins.

"We had about six office boys in three months," Mr. Tyler went on. "She worked them too hard and was a total disbeliever in dying or dead grandmothers, which injured their sensitive family pride. It was an awful job picking out new ones, and I finally tired of it and told Miss Blake that if the present one left she'd have to do the selecting after that. He left the next day.

"I made out an advertisement for a new one and gave it to Miss Blake to take down to the Sun office, but she asked me to hold it back for a day or two, as she had some one in view.

"Meanwhile things at the office were getting worse and worse—not the filing system, of course. That was as exasperatingly perfect as—well, as Miss Blake herself. But the men weren't doing a good day's work in the whole course of a week.

"They were so occupied in carrying out Miss Blake's wishes that they had no time to give to my orders. Even Brennan used to jump around like an office boy for her, and it is the solemn truth that Watkins dusted her desk for her every day, while Peyton watered the window boxes—those window boxes, by the way, that she was going to attend to 'entirely herself.' My clients were being neglected, the work was falling behind, and everything was in a regular mess when she marched in with a girl office boy in tow!

"That was just a little too much!" exclaimed Mr. Tyler.

"Well, well!" said Mr. Harris, almost regretfully. "So you fired her."

"Fired her!" cried Mr. Tyler defiantly. "What do you take me for, a fool? I married her, man!"

"Jehoshaphat!" remarked Mr. Harris, with the calm of an amazement too deep for expression.

As the two men sat staring at each other in silence the door of the private office opened, and a delicate vision entered the room, followed by a rather plain girl.

"Oh, John," murmured the embodiment of charm in sweetly languorous tones, "I've fixed it all so nicely for you. Here is Miss Parker, who will continue my work on the files. I've given her the most minute instructions, and I think she's going to do just exactly as well as I did."

"Yes, my dear," said Mr. Tyler in a voice that was hardly more than a whisper, "you've fixed it, all right," and fell breathless into his chair.

BILLIE RHODES

Billie Rhodes' latest addition to her extensive wardrobe is a novel gown. Every feature is distinctly new, from the lace tunic to the clever draping. Billie certainly knows how to dress. In "Nellie, the Pride of the Fire House," and in "Taking Her Measure" she is gowned most becomingly.

Exceptionally clever photography is shown in the photo play, "Broncho Billy's Vengeance," in which the vision of his dead wife appears to G. M. Anderson, who takes the role of Broncho Billy. The vision comes just as he is about to brand a gambler who eloped with the woman and then neglected her. She comes to beg him not to injure the man. Broncho is overwhelmed and lets the man escape.

"The Girl of the Music Hall" is without doubt the most absorbing production in which Alice Joyce, who enacts the title role, has ever appeared. It tells the story of a girl who surmounts the tremendous obstacles which confront her and wins success and fame.

Riverside, Ill., a suburb of Chicago, has established what is probably the first municipally owned picture theater in the United States. The theater will be owned and operated entirely in the public interest.

Richard C. Travers' powerful build and athletic training stand him in good stead in taking a scene in the photo play, "The Conflict," when he has to lift Sydney Ainsworth, who weighs nearly 200 pounds, from the ground and swing him on horseback. This is done while Ainsworth is supposedly unconscious.

"The Police Dog," an animated cartoon comedy, by C. T. Anderson, shows Officer Piffle of the "white-lights" squad seeking relaxation from his labors by taking a plunge in the harbor. A hungry shark, on the lookout for eats, makes a play for the cop, and the shark and Officer Piffle fight it out to a finish. The shark is glad to get rid of his tormentor, who looks in vain for his trousers. Piffle substitutes a barrel for his missing garment. The barrel is a tight fit, which fact is noted by Billy Goat, who, with a well directed butt, sends Piffle rolling toward the station house, where he finally lands on top of the captain.

W. C. Cabanne has produced a one-reel heart interest drama called "The Better Way," in which Dorothy Gish as a young servant girl keeps up a brave struggle to hold her father, an ex-convict, played by F. A. Turner, in the straight and narrow path.

RIDE A HOBBY.

The woman who is not interested in things in general or something in particular is an uninteresting companion. No matter how beautiful she may be, her charm will be minimized or of short duration.

The victim of ennui or indifference victimizes everybody about her. Her friends may look upon her and admire her beauty, but she is decidedly uninteresting, and even a little bit of her society is generally an overdose.

To be blase is not to be interesting. If you are weary of everything in life you need the attention of a physician; there is something wrong with you, mentally and physically.

Something new and interesting in this world is cropping out every minute. The most interesting people are those who see things and get all possible pleasure out of them. An exhibition of indifference to things about you is not an evidence of intelligence. Intelligent people are the ones whose eyes are open. That is the way they become intelligent. Such people are the most interesting. Sometimes they are so interesting that even if they happen to lack beauty that fact is forgotten in admiration for their intellect.

Some one has said that everybody should ride a hobby.

Teacher Was Fooled.

"What is the German for lawyer, Tommy?" asked Miss Jones of my neighbor.

The German for lawyer is pronounced Ahd-fo-kaht. Although Tommy and I had studied this lesson with great zeal the night before, we could not recollect the word. So Tommy stammered very sullenly:

"I forgot."

"Good!" said Miss Jones, first to Tommy's astonishment, then to his amusement as he saw the point, and finally to his delight, because he avoided getting a zero.—Chicago Herald.

CARE OF NAILS.

Those who have not thought it worth while heretofore should begin now to care for their nails. The little time spent at this will show in good looking nails before very long. The outfit costs so little almost any one can afford it.

Be careful to get a good nail polish, as a rough, inferior one is apt to scratch the nails and in time thicken them.

The Easter Rabbit.

A symbol of Easter quite as familiar is the Easter hare, which is closely associated with the moon.

There have been all sorts of fancies concerning the moon, from the phases of which the time of Easter is fixed, and among many nations the hare is the symbol of the moon itself.

The Hindu and Japanese artists painted the hare across the moon itself, while the Chinese represent the moon as a rabbit pounding rice in a mortar. An old, old Hindu moon legend says that once when Indra, disguised as a famishing pilgrim, was praying for food the hare, having nothing else to offer, threw itself into the fire that it might be cooked for his benefit, and the grateful Indra transported the animal to the moon, where those who have good imaginations declare that it is still to be seen.

Old Enough.

"I understand Miss Whatyoumaycall is going to have a birthday party this evening," the fat plumber observed.

"Yep," answered the thin carpenter. "I've been invited."

"Did she keep her last birthday?"

"Yes; and I'll tell you in confidence I don't believe she ever intends to let go of it."—St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

Albinos.

Albino is a term first applied by the Portuguese to the white negroes of West Africa and is now applied to any individual in whom there is congenital deficiency of pigment in skin, hair, iris and choroid of the eye. The skin is abnormally pale, the hair is [illegible] of pale flaxen, and the iris is pink, the absence of pigment in the iris making an albino's eyes sensitive and [illegible] blind in the sunlight. The chief [illegible] disputing cause is heredity. It may also be due to congenital arrest of development and is sometimes associated with other malformations, but [illegible] occurs in persons who are otherwise normal. White mice, white rabbits, white elephants, etc., are albinos.

will drive in many a run during the coming season.

All in all, it looks like a good season. In each league there are three or four cubs strong enough to work up to the front at any time. Any one of them with so little more than its share of what they call "baseball luck," will be able to make lots of trouble. In the National League, Boston, New York and the Cubs look formidable enough to be considered as pennant winners, while in the American League the Red Sox, White Sox, Athletics, and Detroit will wage a fight which will not be decisive until along toward the end of the season's long run.
